CIRCUS ELEPHANTS.

Some Interesting Points About the Curious Creatures.

Their Uncertainty of Temper Makes Them Dangerous Charges-How They Help in the Work.

The elephant men have to mind their charges every hour of the day and night. The "bull," to use circus slang. sleeps only about two hours, and often loes that on his feet. One fool African elephant-they can't be taught to do anything, and the commonest saying about a show is that they are not worth the hay they eat-has been known to go three weeks without lying down at all. The elephant is always fidgeting about, always swaying that ridiculous hulk of his, which seems to be clad in his big brother's cast-off breeches, always stirring up strife, and always picking at something with his trunk. He might loosen his stake and run wild. He must have something to occupy his mind, and so bales of hay are always at hand to be doled out to him. He must be make you twelve fine presents. What always scolded and talked to, and told to keep out of that, or get back there, or come out where he can be seen. When he isn't being talked to he is being rapped on the nose with a "bull hook. An elephant has a hide about an inch thick, a temper that is as uncertain as the toss of a coin, the cruelty of an Apache, and the destructiveness of a tornado. Some wise and kind-hearted men in New York who couldn't bear to see a poor dumb brute suffer, decreed that the "bull book" must not be used They didn't have to be with the elephants all the time. The men who did either hid the hook part in their hands Hazel Salve," It is infallible for piles while the agents of the S. P. C. A. were and skin diseases. Bewarz of counter- around, or displayed broomsticks that would bring an elephant to time about as soon as a feather duster would stop a cyclone. The bull hook is shaped like a boat book. It has a straight point. This is to jab in where the skin is tenderest, near the root of the tail. It is a sight well worth seeing to witall forms of stomach trouble. It never ness Patsy Forepaugh (his name is Mears, but he was with Addie Forepaugh so long that people hardly know what his right name is) get the elehants to bunt the wagons up from the basement of the Madison Square garden. The workmen get the wagon wed around, so that it will go up the celined plane. Then they scatter like rash before a broom. -Eugene Wood, in Ainslee's Magazine.

The Diagnosis Was Correct. A famous Scotch physician was, unfortunately, given to drink. He drew the line on the safe side of uproariousness and incapability, but not infre quently he was so muddled as to be consciously unfit for his work. One night, when he had more than a wee drappie in his e'e, he was sent for by a lady of title. He responded, went to visit her, sat down gravely by her bedside, looked at her tongue, felt her pulse and asked one or two questions. Consciousness of his unfitness for work, he momentarily forgot himself and ex-claimed: "Drunk, by Jove!" Recovering, he managed to write out a simple prescription and went home crestfallen that he had so badly given himself abuse, or excess and indistient asking him to call. He responded, though much uneasy in his mind because of the summons. The lady told him that she had a confession to make, that he had rightly diagnosed her condition, and that, unfortunately, of late she implored the physician to keep the matter profoundly secret. He listened as grave as a judge. "You may depend upon me, madam," he said, at length; "I shall be as silent as the grave."-Gentleman's Magazine.
