"MOON TOUCH."

These Are the Days in New Jersey When People Become Real "Lunatics."

In all the varied experience of the Camden police and hospitals at no time has there been so many cases of insanity as during the latter part of the summer. In most cases the hallucinations of the unfortunate were grotesque and were attributed to the action of the moon.

This statement seems absurd, but it was made recently in the course of a conversation with an authority on mental afflictions, who also made the declaration:

"Hundreds of people annually become temporarily demented by the cold rays of the full moon."

The majority of the cases occur in torrid latitudes, and the distorted features of the abnormalities of Central America are caused by moon rays. Not infrequently this peculiar influence exerted by that luminary travels over the continents in zones. Anyone who wants to try the experiment will get the effect by sleeping at night under the rays of a new moon. Should the experimenter happen to lie in the zone lit by the mental-disturbing rays the rising sun will find his features horribly distorted and the mind back of them on a rampage.

Sleeping tramps in the fields of this latitude suffer the most from "moon-touch."

The case of Frederick Jones, a tramp, who was arrested by Police Sergeant Abbott, of the Third district, Camden, on July 15, was a case of "moon-touch."

The moon was "falling" then, and Jones looked as if he had been "out with the moon." His mouth was twisted over and had nearly caught on the upper lobe of his ear. His nose was twisted, a "Bergamot" while the "moon-touched" eyelids were, in sailor parlance, "sky-widened."

Another "moon-touched" tramp, found on July 18, near Collingswood, N. J., stood almost motionless in a field for hours. His clothes were decked with branches of leaves.

Seldom are the cases of "moon-touch" either violent or dangerous, and, though sometimes prolonged, the waves of lunacy are uncertain and other-like, and pervade the air. Not infrequently these "moon-touched" waves in a particularly clear and dry month simulate cases of sunstroke.

"Moon-touch" frequently causes aimless wanderings to the subject. The "moon-touch" wave zone is running through the middle states now, and the doctors say: "Look out for distorted faces and increased cases of insanity about August 29. That is full-moon day for this month."—Philadelphia Times.
