THE PORTO RICO ACT.

Now that the Porto Rican question is becoming better understood by the people, the very proper stand taken by the administration is appreciated the more, says the Astoria News. The Democratic party worked its hardest to force the Republicans to adopt the free trade policy. Every effort was made to compel the abandonment of the protective principle, but fortunately without avail. Our sugar, our tobacco, our fruit, our vegetable and other agricultural interests can rest content that, just as soon as the Porto Rican products interfere in our markets with our own farm crops, then they will be fully protected. The principle to do this has been retained, and that is the main object for which the administration contended. We have freed the Porto Ricans from a condition bordering almost upon slavery, and it rests with them to attain a standard that will entitle them to enjoy and uphold the rights and privileges of the constitution of the United States. While we are willing to help the Porto Ricans do this, the principle of protection to our own labor and our own farmers has been rightfully retained in such way that it may be applied when we come to consider the Philippines with their millions of low-priced laborers, and their possible ability to compete disadvantageously with our sugar and tobacco growers.

Democratic papers that are working themselves into a frenzy over Simon's bossship and the apparition of Corbett's candidacy for the United States senate should preserve their souls in patience. The Republicans of Oregon can be trusted to take care of Corbett when the time for action arrives. The Simon-Corbett faction in Multnomah, even with the Oregonian at its back, is not the "whole thing" by any means. The legislative nominees of the Republican party for this district have no connection with any real or fancied Simon-Corbett ring in Portland. They owe nothing to it, have made no pledges to it and are in no way or manner connected with it. They have been selected for their capacity and ability to serve the people, and they enter the campaign owing no allegiance to any political boss and pledged to any senatorial candidate.

Candidate Wm. Smith, who is running (very slowly) for congress in the Second Oregon district, puts free silver at 16-to-1 as the paramount issue, and his slogan. "Consequently," says the Telegram, "Mr. Moody may confidently look for a largely increased majority, as most voters have already heard more free silver gush than is palatable to them."

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

One pound of cork will support a man of ordinary size in the water. Originally the common or domestic goat was a native of the highlands of Asia.

Kansas has 807 newspapers, 51 of them being dailies.

Compared to the waters of the Dead sea, those of the Salt Lake are comparatively fresh.

Our new possession, Costa Rica, supplies the best and largest bananas that come to the United States.

Without winds, heat and moisture could not be distributed over the face of the earth, and without the two man could not exist.

In the various public institutions of the District of Columbia, 2,600 colored people are employed who draw an annual compensation of about $1,000,000.

Hurlington, N. Y., will not collect any taxes this year, the saving on appropriations having gone on so long that the township has sufficient funds to run all departments.

The town of South Newmarket, N. H., is offered a $10,000 public library on condition that its name be changed to Newfields, a title recommended as shorter and more suitable.

A gigantic mushroom, weighing three pounds, was recently found in Sonoma county, Cal. The top was 40 inches in diameter and the stem 11 inches high and two inches thick.

Tarantulas are common in Santiago, Cuba, and sometimes make their way into the beds of sleepers. In the best houses, as a protection against these poisonous spiders, a close netting surrounds every bed.

MORO BLACKSMITHS.

The Native Workmen Are Busy from Morn Till Night Hammering Out Deadly Bolos.

One of the curiosities of life among the Moros is the little blacksmith shop that forms an important adjunct to every town of importance. The shop is usually one large room, in one corner of which is the forge.

The forge, writes a correspondent of the Cincinnati Enquirer, is made on the ground, and in it blazes a fire made of bamboo charcoal. In order to keep the fire hot the smith makes use of a most novel pair of bellows. Two large, upright sections of bamboo are equipped with plungers like those of a pump, and a native, sitting at the top of the tubes, alternately works the plungers up and down, producing exactly the same blow effect as the ordinary bellows of an American shop.

The anvils are arranged on the dirt floor near the forge. They are three pieces of iron, resembling immense railroad spikes. In front of these sit the blacksmiths. The workers assume that peculiar position so common among orientals at all times, and they hammer away with their little hammers for dear life. They wear no clothes, save the breech cloth, and, unlike the village blacksmith, seem to take their task with great seriousness.

One thinks of the "Armer's Song," from "Robin Hood," as he watches the progress of transferring an old rattail file into a keen edged dirk, for it is the work of making arms that gives principal employment to the smith.

From all sorts of old steel he fashions the deadly "bolo"—the universal weapon of the country. With infinite patience he hammers away until the rusty old metal has been called into life, and a shiny, wicked blade has succeeded it.

So skilled are the blacksmiths in this work that many of their weapons present designs that would do credit to makers who had the very best equipped shops. It was surprising, for instance, to learn that the peculiar, snakey shape of the finer blades was made by beating the edge of the hot metal with the round handle of an old Remington rod bayonet.

A great many of these weapons are being purchased and sent back to the states. They promise to be quite a fad with relic hunters. They vary in size, and the prices range from 25 cents up to $15 each.
