The Most Primitive Marsupial. In the Quarterly Journal of Microscopical Science Mr. Hill, of Sydney, gives an account of his important researches into the embryology of marsupials. He has discovered the existence of a distinct placenta in the Bandicoots, and infers that the retention of such a structure indicates a primitive condition. Other organs of the Bandicoots are in a condition which may be described as persistently embryonic, and thus much more primitive than in any other known marsupial. Thus all the evidence points to the view that the marsupials originally developed a placenta, which has been aborted in the more specialized forms.
