

CLUTTER PLACES.

Such Closets Are Apt to Become When They Are Not Properly Attended To.

There is a popular notion that the woman who builds a house first remembers the closets and pantries, and groups the necessary rooms around them. This, says the New York Tribune, is because the average masculine builder is apt to be sadly remiss in arranging a sufficient number of closets. It is quite possible to have too many closets, especially when these little rooms are built without ventilation or sufficient light. It is better to have a few large closets lighted and ventilated, so that there is no danger of their being storage places for impure air, than it is to have a large number of small shut-in places which are so dark that they are certain to become clutter places. It is not desirable to have places where the worn household or the personal belongings of the family can be shoved out of sight and remain forgotten to everything but moth and mold. This is what a dark closet only ventilated from the room into which it opens is apt to become.

A clothes closet cannot be properly built without a small window to light and ventilate it. Even when this is provided clothes that are dank with perspiration or full of the dust and germs of outdoor streets should not be hung in them. When a street wrap or dress is taken off it should be dusted well at first, and, if necessary, hung in the fresh air in front of an open window to free it from all dampness of perspiration before it is hung in the closet. A fine dress, or one of very delicate color, which is likely to fade from long exposure to the light, may be hung in a bag of coarse unbleached muslin. Make such a bag of ample size, and drop the skirt into it, hanging it up at the two upper corners. The waists of such dresses should be folded and laid in bureau or closet drawers.
