Prior to the advent of the whites the Indians had large villages along the river. Among them Wishram, at the cascades, peopled by a villainous lot of thieves and cutthroats, whose descendants, half a century later, became so troublesome Whiting & Willis' Comedians Letters of Credit issued available in the to Lieutenant Sheridan. The Indians along the lower stream were more peaceably inclined. They dwelt in rude plenty, and were fairly prosperous and happy until one of the sailing vessels dropping into the river brought the deadly seeds of smallpox. The pestilence spread among them, and the losses were appalling. So thoroughly were the natives cowed by this disaster that for forty years thereafter, when they became turbulent, to bring them to terms it with the original New York cast, inempty bottle, securely corked, and threaten to let loose the smallpox .-Spokesman-Review.
