THE SENATE AND THE SUBSIDY BILL.

The Washington correspondent of the Globe-Democrat says there wasn't a day from the first week in December to the close of the session of congress when a vote would not have passed the ship subsidy bill by a substantial majority. This is contrary to the general belief, but the correspondent fortifies his statement by recalling the fact that test votes forced the bill before the senate for consideration several times in the proportion of two to one. The cup. simple refusal of the minority to permit a vote on passage coupled with insistence on time for further Figprune. debate postponed final action week after week. Heroic measures were suggested and tried to bring the minority to terms. The senate met earlier than the usual noon hour and attempted night sessions. The capacity of the minority to kill time with talk was exhausted. The session approached the last days with the minority in control of this meas ure, and the fight was abandoned by the champions of the bill. Only one condition gives the senate majority the advantage over the minority in a case like the shipping subsidy bill. That is public sentiment. If popular opinion becomes aroused to the point of demanding legislation which 18 being blocked by a stubborn minority of the senate the latter cough. It grew worse daily. Finally yields. The country at City and Omaha said I had Consumption large manifested little interest in the bill. There was division of views among newspapers of the dominant party. This affected the republican Throat and Lung troubles by G. The democrats or pains in the side or, chest, give it a of the minority's course. Several former senators of that party were in Washington urging enactment of the bill, and from six to eight democratic senators stood ready to vote with the majority whenever final action could be reached.
