COMMON SENSE

The Albany Democrat lays down the following conclusions, which it will be difficult for any person in reason to gainsay, and which go to show that the labor situation is not in any sense partisan in political significance, but that democrats and republicans can agree upon certain common and sensible grounds:

"As soon as a man quits a job it is not his, and he has no further connection with it. That is the long and short of the situation. Whenever a man strikes he has quit his job, and it is none of his business who is put in his place. That is, the striker has no right to disturb the man who takes his place, whoever he is. That is none of his business. While the striker is unreasonable, FRENCH the employer is also unreasonable. He should show a spirit of conpromise in the settlement of differences between him and his employee and should not be boastful of the the Eastern States. fact that he does not have to tackle to the laborer.'

Some New Jersey merchants discharged several clerks because they orable terms, took s week off to attend a state militia encampment. Yet in the THURSDAY . . AUG. 15, 1901 event of a riot in any emergency requiring the services of the militia these merchants would doubtless be the very first ones to how! for military interference and protection.
