Two new wheat diseases have appeared in the United States during the last year. Both of these are Australian diseases and have not been spread here much yet.

These diseases are flag smut and take-all. The smut attacks the leaves instead of the kernel and infected plants do not usually head out.

Take-all is one of the worst wheat diseases in the world where it becomes started. The first symptom in a field is that patches of wheat become dwarfed.

It is very important that both of these destructive diseases be kept out of Oregon, and if any grower finds any traces of some unusual disease in his fall wheat, he should report to the county agent at once.

The director of the extension service of the Oregon Agricultural college, Paul V. Maris, has been instrumental in making arrangements to secure first class harness at a reasonable price—less than the cost of manufacturing.

This harness can be seen at the local county agent's office. It is made of the best back leather, has 3 ply leather tugs and is stitched throughout with heavy linen thread.
