NEW YORK LETTER

NEW YORK, May 16.—The days when fathers began to train their sons at childhood to follow in their steps as fellow craftsmen have not entirely passed. In one profession at least a New Yorker is holding to them. Louis McCarthy, who is paid $75 a day for scaling church spires and skyscraper towers to paint their flagpoles and the trimmings is already seeing to it that Louis, Jr., aged 15 months is prepared for the job. "Sometimes I hold him out of a fourth story window by the wrists, for one thing," explained the steeplejack. "He's never yet shown the slightest sign of fear at it. And we encourage him to climb anything there is about that is climbable." It's about the only trade in which competition doesn't worry a fellow all the time. McCarthy argues, and as only a half-dozen steeplejacks are listed among the 10,000,000 names in the telephone books of New York and its suburbs, it seems that he is correct.

Every college has felt the impetus of higher education due, presumably, to the war. But Columbia University is faced by such a record breaking attendance at this summer's course that she has resorted to registration by mail to facilitate matters. There are already 12,000 applicants, and one of the most interesting things about it is the unusually large percentage from business men and women. Corporation finance, advertising, banking, economic geography, and subjects of that kind are being grasped at by people of early middle age who have already achieved some business success, to a degree unknown before.

The "Life-Saving" suit is the latest invention among the early-season crowds at the beaches hereabouts. It hasn't exactly the child look of some other costumes we have observed, but it certainly is practical. A splashy group of youths alarmed the fishes as well as the beach onlookers the other Sunday at Coney when they merrily walked forth into very deep water indeed, and never made a move to swim. The suits are of rubber, airtight, and, according to their wearers, unsinkable.

An officer of the Seventy-first Infantry, at the Park Avenue Armory, was recently drilling a mounted troop at Van Cortlandt park by wireless telephone. A number of the rank and file were watching him with interest as he shouted his commands into the transmitter. Then as the experiment came to an end, away off in the crowd a voice was heard to remark, "If a Captain can drill his troops by this thing 10 miles away, can you imagine how far behind the lines the generals will be in the next war?"

New York may tighten up on the liberality with which she has been throwing around "the freedom of the city." Aldermanic President La Guardia presented a resolution to that effect at the board meeting the other night. Maybe he thought the city didn't have enough freedom to be giving it about so carelessly; maybe he didn't want to embarrass visitors by having inquisitive aldermen ask who they were when proposals for its bestowal came up, as happened recently, when one of them said, "Who is this Dr. Einstein?" However, as some one pertinently inquired, "When you get this 'Freedom of the city' what have you got?"

Everyone knows that women keep their youth much longer than they used to. But if anyone doubts it, let him (for there are no "hers" who doubt) consider the case of Miss Mary Sherwood, of this city, aged 50 years, who has just been adopted as a daughter of Henry C. Webb. Almost 50 years ago, Mr. and Mrs. Webb lost their only child, a little girl. Soon after they met six-year-old Mary Sherwood. They "borrowed" her from time to time to play about their lonely home and eventually she became a permanent member of the household. So now, 44 years later, upon permission of Surrogate Foley, she has been legally adopted.

"The 400," for so long the country's term for New York society has been disclaimed by its social leaders nowadays. "Four hundred, indeed," they exclaim, "There are not more than 100 of us. Certainly not. Of that 100, they put 50 into the real backbone of society, the 'conservative' and the other 50 into the 'cafe set.'" And this in spite of the fact that the Social Register lists 5000 names.

New York women closely interested in the industrial world are showing considerable enthusiasm over the summer industrial course to be given at Bryn Mawr college, this summer. This course, which was founded by the National Board of the Y. W. C. A., as a war emergency course, was such a success from the beginning that money has been given from the Laura Hellman endowment fund to keep it going. It will open June 15. The course which aims at a practical but not materialistic education, is under the auspices of an administrative committee made up from the college and representatives of women in industry. They consider women of from 20 to 35 years of age the most desirable students, but will take girls of 18. The course consists of classes in English, public speaking, literature, history, labor movements and labor problems, industrial organization, elementary law, hygiene, and a few other branches. There is a precedent for it in the Ruskin college at Oxford which was established by three Americans with much the same purpose in view as had those who instituted this work at Bryn Mawr. It is, however, the first time such a plan has been tried out in the United States.

The Slacker List

The Chronicle disavows responsibility for this list, which is submitted by headquarters, Ninth United States Army Area, San Francisco. The list, after careful check, is presumed by army authorities to be correct. The government allows not to exceed $50 for expenses incurred in capture of these men.
