Complete Washington Tour—Mr. and Mrs. Frank Kargl returned yesterday from a two week's trip, spent touring Washington. They encountered good roads throughout the trip and had the unusual experience of seeing snow five and six feet deep on each side of the road, as they passed through Snoqualmie pass. Librarian Goes East—Miss Flora P. Carr, county librarian, left Sunday afternoon on a vacation trip to visit relatives in the east. She will attend commencement exercises at the University of Michigan, her own alma mater, where her nephew receives his degree this year. Miss Carr is going by way of Seattle, Vancouver, B. Water Will Be Warm—The water in the high school tank will be warmed to 70 degrees for the women's swimming class Tuesday evening, according to announcement made today by the Community Service committee in charge. Miss Charlotte Thrall will be in charge of the class tomorrow, giving lessons to those desiring them. Exercises Well Attended—A crowded house attended the special Children's Day program at the United Brethren church last evening. The chancel of the church was banked with cut flowers and flags. The program was one of much variety, children and grown-ups alike participating. Credit for the excellent program was attributed to Mrs. Margaret White, the Sunday school superintendent, Mrs. Dena Cochran, the primary superintendent and Miss Pansy Newlander, choicester. At the morning service, there were three baptisms and two acceisions. Crest Believed Passed—The crest of the flood, for the time being at least, has apparently been passed. The river now stands at 41.7, or a drop of 7 of a foot since Saturday when the high mark of the year, 42.4 was reached. At the official government reading Sunday morning, the river stood at 42.1 feet, showing the extreme high water had probably been reached some time Saturday night. A no time during the flood has the Columbia river highway immediately east of The Dalles been damaged to any considerable extent. The water did, however, come up to within a few inches of crossing the road-bed at a low place near Five Mile.

THE UNDERDOG Roy Gardner, accomplished bandit and train robber, who is under two sentences which will keep him behind federal prison bars for 50 years if he ever gets there, is at large. Boldly disarming a drowsy guard on a train out of Portland Friday night, Gardner forced the man to release him from his manacles, and is roaming the hills east of Castle Rock, Wash., pursued, it is true, but free. Of the scores of people heard commenting on his desperate escape Saturday and Sunday in The Dalles, half of them said in substance: "Good, and I hope he gets away." Probably the other half thought the same thing. This sentiment was voiced as no special tribute to Gardner. One hears it every time a criminal, no matter how low he may be, makes a break for liberty. It is the curious sentiment, or psychological characteristics of the human mind which makes people root for the underdog. Oregonians will remember that back in 1902, in the days of Harry Tracy, that notorious desperado, after his break from the state prison in Salem, was almost a hero. People of the northwest waited breathlessly between editions of the news papers for news of his most recent brush with law. Until the last one, Tracy was successful, and identical by the same words of approval were exclaimed for Harry Tracy that are being said now. Hero worship is one of our best sentiments, and it manifests itself for any kind of a hero, be he soldier defending his country, or a criminal defending himself from the law. Gardner is the kind of a man who should always for the safety of the rest of his kind, be imprisoned. Yet the folks whom he menaces acclaim him. It is always true that the masses recognize a brave man. The greater the chance he takes, no matter what his character may be, the mightier is the applause that goes up for him. Conversely, there is no scorn on earth equal to that dealt to the man who publicly betrays his cowardice even though among his scorners are persons equally cowardly. Along this same general line of thought however, many people are wondering how fairly guards, armed, and in charge of desperate prisoners who were scarcely manacled, should be so negligent as to allow fellows like Gardner and Pyron get the upper hand and free themselves. With every odd against the prisoners, and with every safeguard apparently possible, having been taken, Gardner is free. Someone was negligent. News paper accounts indicate that one guard had accompanied Pyron to the stinking compartment of the car, leaving Gardner and the other guard together. This guard, accounts say, was drowsy, and the prisoner hit him over the head with the handcuffs, stunning him. The guards were careless in handling these men. In becoming negligent, they were disregarding their duty to the public, the public paid them, to see that the criminals Gardner and Pyron were put away. But no matter what the conditions surrounding their escape may be, Gardner is coming the woods, where there is plenty of food and water in the summer time, with good chances of not being recaptured. And the people who were being safeguarded by his imprisonment, wishing him well.
