In my drawer I have a casket, Filled with jewels rich and rare, Treasures that to me are precious— None can equal, none compare.

The Bravery of Women.

The Gentleman's Magazine for August, 1739, records the death of one Christiana Davis, on the 7th of July, of that year, who served with great valor in the Inniskilling Dragoons, etc.

She was born in Dublin, in 1667, the year after the first fire in London. When her father, who was a malster and brewer, was in arms for William III, the papists blocked up the church door of Leslip, while her mother was at Church, with blocks and other lumber.

"Fearing my mother would receive some hurt," she adds, in her own account of it, "I seized a spit, and sallied forth to force my way; but being resisted by a sergeant, I ran my spit through the calf of his leg, and removed the things which blocked up the door, and called to my mother, bidding her come away, for the dinner was ready!"

This was a good beginning for a brave life. Not long afterward her aunt died, leaving her a tavern, to which she removed—marrying one Richard Welsh, who proved a tender husband to her.

It would seem that the first overtures were made through a female friend. One day, Welsh was persuaded to take farewell of a schoolfellow, and, having been induced to share a bowl of punch on board a vessel laden with recruits, was made intoxicated and carried over to Holland—a very usual trick in those days. Here he was made to enlist in Lord Orrey's regiment of foot, now the Fifth Royals.

Then began the wife's trials and her heroisms; and truly her life forms a very wonderful story. Determined to find her husband she left one child with her mother, and one, born after her husband's departure, with her nurse. She cut off her hair, dressed herself in her husband's clothes, and, finding Ensign Lawrence beating up for recruits at the "Golden Last," she enlisted under the name of Christopher Welsh.

foot soldier." Proposing, therefore, to work her way upward by bravery to a commission, she cut herself free of her too fond sweet-heart.

Her term being out as foot soldier, she tried the cavalry, and served with honor in Lord John Hay's Dragoons, now the Scots Grays, being present in 1695 at the siege of Namur.

After the peace of Ryswick, Christiana, not having found her husband, returned to Ireland, unknown and unrecognized, so much was she bronzed and altered by exposure. She visited her children; but, being too poor to pay the expenses she had incurred, was glad to pass unknown.

War again breaking out, she joined her old regiment, was engaged at Nimeguen, at the siege of Venloo, and at the second attack at Schellenberg, where she received a ball in her hip, which was never extracted. Although taken to the hospital, her sex escaped detection.

Convalescent, but still carrying the ball in her wound, she was, at the glorious battle of Blenheim, set to guard the prisoners, and there by chance, she met with her husband, who, having thought her long dead, was consoling himself with the attentions of a Dutch woman.

At once Christiana's love forgave all. She made herself known to him, and, finding him to be in Lord Orkney's regiment, resolved to serve with him and pass as his brother. Then she left him—giving him a piece of gold as a token of her love.

All through the great war, conducted by the greatest captain of that age, or perhaps of any other, the Duke of Marlborough, this heroic woman fought. At Ramillies she went through the thickest of the battle unhurt; but, unhappily, when the fight was done, a piece of shell from a steeple, exploding, struck the back of her head and fractured her skull. She was trepanned, and suffered immensely for two weeks; but this did not trouble her so much as the discovery of her sex.

The news spread far and near, and Lord John Hay, her colonel, said she should want for nothing. Brigadier Preston made her a present of a new silk dress. Her husband was brought to her, and she was set free from the service with a handsome present.

Nor was this all. The chaplain of the regiment declared that there should be a new wedding—all the officers being invited to the ceremony—and, with much fun and jollity, this took place. The bride's stocking was thrown according to old custom, and, on taking leave, all the officers, commencing with the Colonel, begged permission, with the solemn politeness of the times, to kiss the bride.

At a battle near Ath, she wounded one soldier in the hand and killed another. At the same time a shot wounded her in the chin, and knocked her down. Her husband ran to pick her up, thinking her dead, but found her only stunned.

At Ghent, the Dutch woman, before spoken of, inveigled her husband into a public-house, on which Christiana fought with her, and cut off her nose, with a case-knife, close to her face.

At the siege of Ghent, she followed her husband in the forlorn hope, and, eluding the vigilance of the Colonel, who would have stopped her, found him and gave him "a bottle of brandy, which was a great comfort to him."

He was killed at the hot battle of Malplaquet, and the fond wife came up just as his body was being stripped by a marauder, whom she beat off. Throwing her husband's body across her mare—she then acted as a sutler—she took it to the rear, buried it, and would have thrown herself into the grave with it, had she not been prevented.

This singular woman was married twice afterward. She was presented with fifty pounds by Queen Anne, and a shilling a day for life, which pension Lord Treasurer Oxford reduced to fivepence; but Mr. Secretary Craggs, the friend of Pope, replaced it at its original sum.

She marched with other soldiers—and with streaming eyes and a heavy heart—at the funeral of the great Duke of Marlborough, under whom she had fought so long and so well, and died loyally at last, full of the same courage and love she had ever shown.

THE OLDEST CITY.

Damascus is the oldest city in the world. Tyre and Sidon have crumbled on the shore; Baalbec is a ruin; Palmyra is buried in a desert; Nieveh and Babylon have disappeared from the Tigris and the Euphrates. Damascus remains what it was before the days of Abraham—a centre of trade and travel, an island of verdure in the desert, "presidential capital," with martial and sacred associations extending through thirty centuries.

It was near Damascus that Saul of Tarsus saw the light above the brightness of the sun; the street which is called Strait, in which it was said he prayed, still runs through the city. The caravan comes and goes as it did a thousand years ago. There is still the sheik, the ass, and the water wheel. The merchants of the Euphrates and the Mediterranean still occupy their wares. The city which Mahomet surveyed from a neighboring height, and was afraid to enter "because it was given to man to have but one paradise, and for his part he was resolved not to have it in this world," is to-day what Julian called the "eye of the East," as it was, in the time of Isaiah, "the head of Syria."

From Damascus came the damson, or blue plum, and the delicious apricot of Portugal, called damasco; damask, our beautiful fabric of cotton and silk, with vines and flowers raised upon a smooth, bright ground; the damask rose, introduced into England in the time of Henry VIII; the Damascus blade, so famous the world over for its keen edge and wonderful elasticity, the secret of whose manufacture was lost when Tamerlane carried the artist into Persia; and that beautiful art of inlaying wood and steel with gold and silver, a kind of mosaic engraving and sculpture united, called damaskeening, with which boxes, bureaus, and swords were ornamented. It is still a city of flowers and bright waters; the streams of Lebanon and the "silk and gold" still murmur and sparkle in the wilderness of the Syrian gardens.
