A Horrible Death,

A gentlemen from Hamilton, Ohio, gives the particulars of an accident so horrible in its sickening details as to be almost beyond credence. The circumstances are as follows:

On Saturday morning week, carpenters set to work in the third story of Beckett's paper mill, in that town, for the purpose of making repairs and improvements in the third story of the building. In the course of their repairs it became necessary to take up part of the floor, After this had been done, it seems the carpenters went to another portion of the building for the purpose of preparing material to complete the improvement. It appears that this aperture was directly over the huge hopper on the second floor, used for grinding rags. The carpenters it seems—carelessly and culpable—failed to erect any barricade around this hole, thus leaving it a death-trap to any unfortunate who might happen to pass that way. During the after-
