Jefferson's Old Age.

Jefferson's public life was now brought to a close. He had attended the inauguration of his friend, James Madison, his succes sor in the Presidency, and still was a vigorous man of sixty-six years of age. He retired to Monticello about the middle of March, able to general assortment ofaccomplish the journey there on horseback. Here he resided through the remaining seventeen years of his life.

Mr. Jefferson can not be reproached with any fondness for money, or for any disposition unduly to hoard or to accumulate it. His expenditures were always those of a generous and liberal mind. In his youth, when it could not have been the custom for young men to collect a library, we find that he lost by the burning of his house at Shadwell, books which cost him a thousand dollars. Not discouraged by this, during all his active life, he had purchased books in literature. science, history, diplomacy, the classics, belles-lettres, such as were important to his mental culture. The hospitalities of his mansion. too, had always been without stint or bound according to the custom of the country in which he lived, and this, the attraction of his dis tinguished and agreeable socia qualities, and of his important political position, had rendered very burdensome to a fortune which could never have been considered very large, and of a nature which could only have been made to yield any considerable income by a degree of care and attention which he was never in a position to afford. In his public life he had always considered it due to the dignity of his high political positions, to apportion his expenses in a liberal manner for hospitality, service and equipage. And, in fact, during his institutions which had existed. and of the circumstances of forms and dignities with which Washingten had recently surrounded himself, it would have hardly been possible for him to make any savings, either from the allowances of his official employments or from the income of his private fortune.

He returned, then, to Monticello in declining life, with a moderate income, and with great demands upon it. The principal occupa tions of his remaining years were the education of his grand-children who lived with him, the manage ment of his own estates, hospitali ties to numerous guests, and most of all, the writing of replies to : multitude of letters with which he was quite overburdened and almost overwhelmed. Thus for sixteen years he passed his time, for the most part in the daily duties and the daily pleasures of the life of : country gentleman. The order of hi life was at times shaded and dark ened by serious anxieties as to hi peculiary affairs. These severely pressed upon him during his latte years, not so much by reason of his own improvidence, as of failure or the part of friends whom he has trusted. Yet, notwithstanding thee things, he still preserved his philosophy and secenity of mind. and made such arrangements a were possible to meet his obligations and preserve his independence. During the period from 181 to 1826, he had also found very se rious and continued occupation is founding the establishment of the University of Virginia. He has resumed the projects of his youth which were for the education of al classes of white people. By influ ence, constantly and unremittingly exhibited, the Legislature of hi State had made grants, not indeed so large as he demanded, but stil in large and liberal measure, to the purposes of education, general ly for the founding of the Universi ty of Virginia. The control and superintendence of this establish ment in its earlier years, indeed its intimation and foundation, were confided by the State to a board board of Visitors, upon which were glad to serve the most distinguished men of Virginia, with Mr. Jefferson as their rector and chief. To Mr. Jefferson it was mainly due that the most able and learned merwere induced to serve as professorin this institution, and that its con stitution was of the most liberal

The year 1828 found him at the orisis of his fortunes and of his life. Eighty-three years old, infirm in body, the vigor of mind failing, the embarrassments of his pecuniary affairs harrassing, and suddenly much aggra rated by an unexperted loss of considerable amount, he found himself obliged to consider how he should manage to dispose BOOTS and SHOES pay his debts and supply the recessities of living. While engaged in proposing such arrangements as occurred to him, and while his private and public friends and the Legislatures of some of the states were occupied in devising measures for the pecuniary relief of one to For Fall and Winter Wear, whom they were so much indebted, Are on hand and b ing constantly replenworn with eares and disorders, he quietly expired, a little after noon, on the 4th of July, 1826, about four hours before the death of his compatriot and friend, John Adams and just fifty years after himself and the same John Adams had signed that declaration which, on the 4th of July, 1776, announced to the world the independence of America. - Theodore Parker.
