construction of merchant shipping increases steadily.' Although we energetically repudiate the first part of the assertion, so far as the proportions of sinkings to the decreasing tonnage comes into the question, e must here add the 'but' which Geddes prudently omits. 'But the sinkings are stil far in excess of the number of ships being built, and that is the main point.

"During the course of the interview we hear of a fresh example of the cunning of the German official statements of submarine results in the 'factor of exaggeration.' Geddes maintains that the official figures are exaggerated, and that the German admiralty always adds a few thousands tons to keep up the level. They evidently do not yet know in England that the absolutely correctness of the statements contained in a report is a point of honor with a German officer, and equally so with the admiralty staff. Every German will readily understand that from the way in which the English reports are presented. We are obliged to explain this, because the first lord of the English admiralty has made the impudent assertion that the German admiralty falsified its reports.

Exaggeration Charge Evaded. "Towards the end of the Geddes interview it is somewhat difficult to follow his meaning. He considers this 'curve of exaggeration' which he has discovered, as a 'fairly accurate reflection of the German official mind.' That, of course, is a matter of personal opinion, but he proceeds to state that it is an official confession that the submarine campaign is regarded as a failure by its own leaders.' The impertinent invention of the first lord is therefore a confession of the German offocial authorities. We are not able to follow him into these regions 'o," higher

"When Sir Er'c further maintains that the German assertion that decreased sinkings are due to the decrease in the number of ships sailing is incorrect, as is proved by the English statistics of ships leaving and arriving, we think it would be well to reply by giving an illustration of the absolutely erroneous impression putposely given by the English method of drawing up shipping at statistics. The captain of a neutral merchant steamer, received by an English customs officer, whose tongue had been loosened by grog, in answer to his question as to the reason for his being sent by English officiais from one port to another, and after a short time always sent on again, was given the reply that this was done in order that the number of incoming and outgoing ships might be increased for the statistics.

Mutinies Are Denied.

"The policy of secrecy concerning the sinkings of German submarines by English forces, Sir Eric asserts, is to this that our submarine commandlies told about them by the Englah signed a full confession. without turning a hair. How much more easily will they be able to enunderstand.
