PORTLAND, Or., April 18 .- The resounding "Hee-Haw" of the American army mule awakening the echoes and making nights hideous almost anywhere in France, can be prevented in simpler fashion than by operation upon the throats of the asimals, to which the French veterinarians are said to resort, according to F. S. Akin, a Portland pioneer.

vent it from emitting its blatant bray, he declares.

Mr. Akin's knowledge dates back to the early days of Oregon, when mule team drivers found this way of keeping their slumbers from being disturbed. The theory involved is that in order to bray with success No. and wonted harmony, a mule must stretch its neck and elevate its caudal appendage to the horizontal. Denied this privilege by the weight of a small rock or sack of sand, the beast fails to vocalize its thought. The same principle is involved in the better known expedient of putting a low roo! above a rooster's perch, thus preventing it from stretching its neck to greet the dawn in approved chanticleer fashion.
