table was perfectly appointed, the glass and silver glittering, the linen immaculate; but our eyes glanced carelessly over these things to rest in delighted appreciation upon the centerpiece. In a low Japanese bowl of dull green was a glowing mass of nasturtiums, rich with scarlet flame and gold. It was then for the first time, I think, that I realized the full beauty of the nasturtium. The vision of that dining table haunted me all through the spring months, and then in the fall I bought some seeds and began to experiment.

"That winter I did not have a blossom, though they ran riot in April and May. Another year brought the same results. A third year, by the merest chance, I found out a more successful way, and since then I have been able to procure winter-bloom.

"The lucky chance that set me on the right path was as follows: That spring I had sowed my seeds in pots as in previous years, but with very little hope of success after my earlier experiments. True to my forebodings the little plants began to shed their lower leaves within a month or so, and to grow spindly and sickly in appearance. By fall I had had a fair per centage of blossoms, but the plants were anything but thrifty with one exception. This was a plant that I had taken up from a neighbor's garden in August, wishing to preserve its unique color. The plant had been surely six feet high, and at the time of transplanting I had cut it back to within a few inches of the ground. Later, as growth had commenced, I had provided a trellis. This trellis in September was a mass of healthy, thick green stems, with a profusion of blossom buds. From October until May I think I can truthfully say that it was never wholly out of bloom. I think anybody can have equal success if they will follow the rules given below.

"As soon as the ground is warm enough, say in early May, sow the seeds in a shallow trench out of doors. I buy a large packet of mixed seeds, and it is important to buy only from a well-known, reliable firm if you wish a large assortment of colors. The plants will take care of themselves, but should be given a trellis to climb upon. I have found the climbing varieties to be far superior to the dwarf for winter culture, as they seem much freer in bloom. In my experience Madam Gunter's Hybrids give the most unusual range of color.

"About the end of July look over the row and take up the colors you desire, cutting the plants back to within three inches of the ground. One plant only should be placed in a

WINTER-BLOOMING NASTURTIUMS.
A correspondent for the Woman's Home Companion tells of her success with winter-blooming nasturtiums. Nothing could add so much to the beauty and cheer of a simple dining-room as a growing nasturtium in the window, and a few of the bright blossoms and green leaves for the table. We think the plan well worth trying, and our readers who are interested may profit greatly by this writer's experience in the matter, so we print the article as follows:
"Some years ago I was at a December luncheon in the city. A four-inch pot. I have tried both the larger and smaller pots, and also using two and three plants to a pot, but in every case have had better luck when one plant to a four-inch pot was used.

"When the colors are chosen, and the stocky stems transplanted, the pots should be plugged at the bottom to prevent the roots from striking through the drainage hole, and then sunk in the ground in a moderately sunny place, up to the rims of the pot.

"A small trellis about eighteen inches high, such as can be cheaply bought at any seed store, should be used to each pot. As the plants send up new shoots these should be trained around and through the trellis. Watering will depend upon the location in the garden. If kept too wet the leaves will turn yellow, and it is better to err on the side of dryness. The pots, being porous, will absorb a good deal of moisture from the earth.

"For soil they like a sandy loam rather poor in quality. If grown in rich soil they will produce magnificent leaves but few blossoms. In the middle of the winter I have used a little dissolved plant food, occasionally when watering them. But too much fertilizer will check the blooming immediately, strange as this may seem.

"Before heavy frost the plants should be brought in and the pots placed in a sunny window close to the glass. This is a very important point in their success. They seem unharmed by quite severe extremes of heat and cold, but must get all the direct sunlight possible. Here again it is better to be sparing of water. Wait until the soil is dust-dry before watering. Then soak them thoroughly and let dry out again.

"I had thought to improve the winter yield of flowers by disbudding the plants until November, but as far as I could see this treatment made no difference.

"A dozen plants of assorted colors grown by this method will, I predict, furnish a table bouquet throughout the winter."

SOLDIERS OF THE SOIL.
The work of growing food is next in importance to that of fighting in the trenches.

Not only has civilian production been vastly stimulated in all of the allied countries, but much military cultivation of land has been undertaken.

In England every military camp and every German prisoners' camp is engaged in military agricultural operations. Soldiers are cultivating 50,000 acres behind the lines in France, 7000 acres in Salonika, about 700,000 acres in Mesopotamia and large areas in Egypt, Palestine and Cyprus.

It is estimated that Mesopotamia will total 25,000 tons of wheat and 100,000 tons of barley from this military cultivation. To accomplish this there have been tractors, threshers and hand implements sent from India and Australia, as well as from Great Britain.

At Salonika there are now growing 2100 acres of barley, 500 acres of wheat, 700 acres of potatoes, 2000 acres of corn and 1700 acres of other crops.

These soldiers are growing food to help feed themselves. They know that the less food they have to get from the outside world the more ships will be available to bring men and ammunition. And the more of that outside food they can get from America, instead of from remote lands such as Australia and New Zealand, the more ships will be saved for the shorter haul between Europe and our own shore.

VALUE IN A REGISTERED COW.
An eastern dairy farmer wrote to a friend concerning the first registered cow he placed in his herd over 20 years ago. The cow cost $45.00. He kept her for 13 years and sold her for $100. In all he has owned 123 of her descendants to the sixth generation. Of these he has sold $3 for $11,029.32, retaining the remainder. He estimates that $25,000 is a low estimate of the value that is one animal added to his worldly possessions.

BIDS INVITED FOR HAY.
