A LEADER-IMITATORS ALWAYS pick out the very best article on the market and seek to imitate it. At various times during the past 25 years that the Oregon Fire Relief Assn. of McMinnville has, been successfully conducted, many imitation companies have sprung up; they have heliered around for a few short years about being just as good as the C.F. R. A. etc., then one by one and sometimes two by three they have faded away. You should not blame us for having imitators, nor for their fallures. Any good thing is bound to be imitated. The O.F.R.A. is the real thing and is today, as it has been for the mast several years. the past several years, one of the leading companies of the entire coun-were the paramount factors of the active week in the securities market, The only adverse development, and that was regarded as merely temporary, was the apparent halt in the liberty loan campaign. Financial interests as a whole expressed their firm conviction, however, of the unqualified success of that undertaking in the final week of the drive. Dealing in stocks were broad, the net resuit distinctly favoring the bull account but trading was largely of speculative origin. Next to United States Steel, which ebbed and flowed in a radius of 3 % points, and closed the week at a loss of little more than a point, an enormous percentage o fthe daily operations consisted of shippings and oils at extreme gains of 1 0to 15 points. Existing liberty bonds were very active and higher in the main but in no instance did they approximate their maximums. Foreign bonds, especally French 'municipals, stiffened, but Russian issues featured the trading on the "curb," external 5 1/2 s and 6 1/2 s advancing 15 to 20 points on accumulation generally attributed to well-informed sources.

After we had finished lies with the greatest liberality. Dr. our dinner, and my cousin had told I. Stuart Nagle, a Methodist mission- me about his caring. I was very 19 much upset, for I did not dream co "Oh, of course not," interjected

Dicky contemptuously. "Taking off your rings showed that." "I began to cry," I went on, loathsays, give more than a tenth of ing myself for telling all this, but i determined to go through with the the thing of through with the thing of through the thing of t

"What stuff is this?" Dicky inter-

"Yes, I know," I returned, " but I did not flud them for nearly an hour. We rushed back to the restaurant, and Jack went in to look for them. While he was gone Mr. Underwood passed the taxi, and, see-"I'm almose glad you had a head- ing me, thought I was on my way to Just then Jack his home. came down the steps and said to me. I can't find them anywhere.' Mr. Underwood asked if we had lost anything, and I answered, 'No, nothing of any consequence,' for I did not wish him to know anything about t. But he happened to look at my ungloved hand, and he said, 'Oh, I see, nothing of any consequence,' so snerringly."

"Don't You Know?"

Dicky uttered a vigorous oath and rising began to pace up and down the

"Mr: Underwood went away then, continued, "and Jack and I started to find you. He said if I had lost my rings he was going to be the one to tell you. But when I put on my gloves the rings rolled out of a glove. and I put them on and came home here, and then went over to Mrs. underwood's. Mr. Underwood telephoned me here before I left, saying he would not speak of the loss of the rings, but I told him a falsehood about them. You did? What?" Dicky's voice was sharp and peremptory. "I told him that my rings had not been lost, that my gloves were too tight and that I had removed them to put on my gloves." "Good!" Dicky's voice held a note of relenting. "That's one thing saved any way. Wonder your conscience would let you tell you that much of a lie."

His sneer roused me. I had been speaking in a dreary monotone which typified my feelings. Now I faced im indignant. "See here, Dicky Graham, don't you imagine 't would have been easfer for me to lie about all this? I didn't need to tell you anything.
