

The CLARINDA Electric Washer and Wringer

The Clarinda Electric Washer is the most compact and intensely practical power washer made. All gears and working parts are completely enclosed in dust proof casings. It has no belts, no chains, no cams, no cranks, no pitmans, and no exposed gears—which are dangerous features and should not be permitted in any home. SAFETY is the first essential in any machine—either for the factory or home. So completely enclosed is every gear and working part of the Clarinda Electric that the only moving part visible in the operation of the machine is a small semi-revolving smooth knob that operates the "dolly." Noiseless gears make the machine quiet in operation. All the mechanism is on top so that the oil holes are of easy access for oiling. The electric motor is of the completely enclosed type, designed especially for and absolutely essential to the home type of power washer. A full one-quarter horse power Emerson Ventilated motor is used on the Clarinda Electric, fitted with cord ready to be attached to an electric light socket.

REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

The Story of a Honeymoon

A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by ADELE GARRISON

CHAPTER CXXVI

WHY DICKY'S MOTHER REFUSED TO REMAIN IN HIS HOME ANY LONGER.

"My Dear Mrs. Graham," Dr. Pettit's letter began, "I am enclosing the bill for which you asked. I wish all my patients were as conscientious as you.

"Are you enjoying your summer in Marvin? I know you must be, for it is a delightful old place. I know it well, and have spent most of my rare hours off in that section. I am fearfully busy, but hope to run out to Marvin for a few days before the summer ends. Then I shall give myself the pleasure of calling upon you—if I may. Cordially yours, Herbert Pettit."

I laid the letter down with a whole chorus of questions running through my mind. Why had Dr. Pettit written such a letter? Why had Dicky read it? Why, after reading it, had he kept it and not given it to me? Was this partly the reason for his growing coldness and indifference? Dicky had given me permission to rummage his pockets for bills which he invariably forgot to turn over to me for my files. In going through his pockets I had come across this letter from Dr. Pettit, sent in response to a request of mine for his bill dated two weeks before. The letter had been opened and I felt sure Dicky had read it. In all my bewilderment I had a little sick feeling at my heart that Dicky should have been guilty of opening and reading a letter addressed to me, for the envelope bore no identifying mark. I scrutinized the letter carefully again. The "Mrs." in the subscription might have been taken for "Mr." by anyone looking at it hurriedly. For the "s" had been blurred. Then too, the letter was not torn open. The flap might have loosened before Dicky received it, and he might have opened it under the impression that it was his own.

But had he read it after all? This was the question that tormented me. If he had, it was totally unlike Dicky to keep his knowledge from me. The Dicky of the earlier days of our marriage would have been ungenerously angry and jealous over even so innocuous a letter as this addressed to me from another man.

My own particular little mocking devil gave me the key to Dicky's failure to hand me the letter. "He simply isn't interested in anything you may do," the little demon said. "It's Grace Draper's actions he's worrying about just now. He's read the letter and forgotten all about it. That's all the interest he takes in you."

Miserably I remembered the scene Dicky had made in the first month of our marriage when I had received a letter from my brother-cousin, Jack Bickett, the nearest relative I had. He had raged like a fiend, and I had been miserable at the prospect of enduring the senseless jealousy for the rest of my life. I told myself drearily that evidently I did not need to worry over that any longer.

With a sudden raging impulse which I did not understand I went to my desk, wrote out a check for the amount of Dr. Pettit's bill, fastened it to the bill, and then wrote a brief acknowledgement of his letter. "Dear Mr. Pettit: Your note and bill have just reached me—the fault of the local postal system. I am so sorry for the delay. I fear you will change your mind about my conscientiousness. Yes, indeed, I am enjoying the summer, and shall be most pleased to see you if you come to Marvin.

"I am enclosing check. Very sincerely yours, Margaret Spencer Graham."

I addressed, sealed and stamped the letter, laid it aside to be mailed, and then went on with my methodical search of Dicky's pockets. I had barely put everything back again when he came in. "Letter for you," he said, "from the office of your old principal."

Thoughts That Thronged.

He tossed it into my lap, eyeing it and me curiously. I knew that his desire to know what was in it had made him remember to give it to me. His mother who had opened her door at his step, came forward eagerly. I opened the letter, to find an offer of my old school position. My principal wrote that the woman who had been appointed to the position had been suddenly taken ill and could not possibly fill it. He asked me to write to him my decision at once, as it was within a few days of the opening of the school.

Mechanically I read it aloud. My brain was whirling. I wondered if perhaps this was the way out for me. If Dicky did not really love me any longer I ought to accept this position, even if by taking it I broke my agreement with the Lotus Study club.

I had finished a successful season of lectures with the Lotus Study club in spite of the skillfully concealed animosity of the secretary, Mrs. Helen Brainerd Smith. I knew that she had never forgotten the incident of my first appearance before the club when I had deliberately betrayed parsimony to the members of the club—as the only method of compelling her to pay me the amount she had agreed upon.

Although her office was that of secretary, she was the real leader of the club, owner of the house in which the club rooms were, and virtually the dictator of the club's policy. I felt it to be a real triumph that in spite of her covert opposition the members of my study class had insisted upon my reappointment to the position.

Mother Graham's Suggestion.

I did not like the thought of leaving the women who had thus honored me, but on the other hand, if Dicky and I were to come to the parting of the ways I could not refuse this rare chance to get back into the work I had left for his sake.

I decided to be guided by his attitude. If he were opposed to my course I would know that my actions had ceased to be resentful to him and I would accept the position. But if he showed willingness at the proposition—

I did not have long to wait. As I lifted my eyes to his face when I had finished reading the letter I saw the old familiar black frown on his face. I had never thought that my heart would leap with joy at the sight of Dicky's frown but it did. Before either of us could say anything, his mother spoke:

"Isn't it splendid? You are a most fortunate woman, Margaret, to be able to step back into a position like that. If it had come earlier when my health was so poor, you could not have taken it. Now you can accept it for I am perfectly able to run the house. You, of course, will write your acceptance at once."

She paused. I knew she expected me to reply. But I closed my lips firmly. Dicky should be the one to decide this. He did it with thoroughness.

"I thought we settled all this last spring," he said. "Mother, I don't want to be disrespectful, but this is my business and Madge's, not yours. You will refuse, of course, Madge."

He turned to me in the old imperious manner. Months before I should

Monday evening after drill a company meeting was held at which several committees were appointed. The committee on formulating rules to govern the military club rooms have completed their work and the use of the fully equipped club rooms in the armory will be open to members of Company M this week. The committee on athletics have plans for a basketball team and also a baseball organization. The reports of these two committees will be heard at a company meeting following tomorrow night's drill. Now that the men are getting their regular allowance from the government and also due to the spirit being shown in the club rooms and athletic enterprises, the company has been making a fine showing, and it is expected that from now on there will be a full turnout for every drill.
