PARLIN GIVEN GOOD HEARING

Commercial Research Man of Curtis Publishing Company Banqueted

Over 120 Salem business men last night gathered at the Marion hotel to enjoy a banquet given under the auspices of the Pheasant Northwest Products company for Charles Coolidge Parlin, director of the bureau of commercial research of the Curtis Publishing company.

Robert C. Paulus, president of the Commercial club, made the opening address at the banquet, telling of the need for more members. He was followed by H. S. Gile, president of the juice manufacturing company. Briefly the latter sketched the growth of the berry industry in this county from the time he made his first trip east in the interest of loganberry product up to the present time.

Speaking of recapitalizing the concern, he said: "While you fellows didn't show much interest in the stock we first issued, you'll shortly have another chance to invest in some absolutely gilt edge paper. Because of the necessity for refinancing we shall put out new stock and give the people here a chance to invest first. The recapitalization will be for a million and a half. Our sales last year amounted to $1,225,000 and this season they should be more on account of the new jelly and jam plant."

William Walton of the Ladd & Bush bank summed up the importance of the juice manufacturing industry in the city.

"Without this plant the berry interests in Salem would probably be the same as they were in 1914. This particular business has been the balance wheel ever since it came here," he declared.

Two men from the publishing company had at first been scheduled to speak, but William Boyd, the advertising director, was unexpectedly called east and Mr. Parlin undertook to cover his ground also. The speaker brought with him a series of charts by means of which he explained the disproportionate increase in prices, the value of tractor farming as compared with the use of horses and the disappearance of the old-style hayseed producer. That there would be a great need for labor saving devices in the reconstruction period was one of the points he emphasized, as he maintained increase in building enterprises and other industries would create a sufficient demand for labor and capital to use up the slack resulting from the war. The farm market he offered as another solution.

In conclusion Mr. Parlin said: "The most difficult thing for a co-operative organization to do is to hold together after attaining success. There is a need for national advertising which guarantees the quality of the product. Of course, unless the goods have merit the advertising cannot help it."

He particularly praised the Pheasant products, declaring they are achieving a nation wide reputation

HIGH COSTS ASSAILED

"I am in favor of the lower cost of living, but cannot meet these prices. Why should Vilgrain pick on me?"

He said that his receipts had fallen off more than 50 per cent.

Returning, the correspondent noted a great line formed outside the Theatre-Franceals, awaiting an opportunity to buy reserved seats at tonight's performance at $2 each. By strange coincidence, the picture on the board was a hitherto unproduced comedy by Victor Hugo, entitled "Shall They Eat?"

Mamma—Willie, you have no manners.
