Corn Market Jumps to Season's Highest Level

CHICAGO, March 12.—Sensational upturns in hog values notwithstanding withdrawal of all restrictions on hog shipments, made the corn market today jump to the highest level yet this season for March delivery, $1.48 a bushel. Prices closed nervous at 3⅝ to 5¢ net advance, with May $1.40⅝ to 1.40⅞ and July $1.35⅝ to $1.35⅝. Oats gained ⅝ to 1⅛ and provisions 12 to $1.

Owing to the fact that before the opening of the corn market, hog prices had bulged as much as fifty cents, a decided upyard swing for corn was inevitable Bullish sentiment was further emphasized by advices indicating speedy signing of a peace treaty with Germany and by attention given to statements of a leading economist that high prices were here to stay for many years.

Oats climbed with corn.

Maximum advances were the rule in provisions. Soaring hog values furnished the impetus.

REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

The Story of a Honeymoon

A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by ADELE GARRISON

CHAPTER CCXXXVII

WHY DICKY DID NOT RELISH THE APPEARANCE OF DR. PETTIT UPON THE SCENE.

"Ah! Mrs. Graham this is an unexpected pleasure."

Dr. Pettit's eyes looked down into my own with an expression that emphasized the words he had just uttered. His outstretched hand clasped mine warmly, his impressive greeting embarrassed me a bit, and I turned instinctively toward Dicky to see if he had noticed the young physician's extraordinarily cordial greeting.

But this I had no opportunity to discover, for as I turned a taxi drew up to the curb where the Underwoods, Dicky and I were waiting for the little Cresthaven Beach trolley, and Dicky sprang to greet Grace Draper and the Durkees—Alfred Durkee and his mother, who completed our party for the motor boat trip.

"I am very glad to see you, Dr. Pettit," I murmured conventionally, then hurriedly: "Pardon me a moment, I must greet these guests. I will be back."

When I turned to him after welcoming Grace Draper with forced friendliness, and the Durkees with the real warmth of liking I felt for them, I found him talking to Lillian.

"Of course, I remember you, Mrs. Underwood," he was saying. "I shall never forget the skill and presence of mind with which you handled that baby in convulsions the night I first saw all of you."

"That was nothing at all," returned Lillian, indifferently, "just what every woman ought to be able to do."

"But, unfortunately, few women have those qualities in the degree you possess them," returned the physician gallantly.

"Well, Dr. Pettit," Dicky came up at this juncture, "out for the day?"

His tone was cordial enough, but I, who knew every inflection of Dicky's voice, realized that he did not relish the appearance of Dr. Pettit upon the scene.

"Yes, I'm going down to the shore for a dip," the young physician returned. And then without a trace of the stiff dignity which I had seen in his professional manner, he acknowledged the introductions which I gave him to Grace Draper and the Durkees.

Both Harry Underwood and Lillian, of course, needed no introduction to him. Neither the Underwoods nor ourselves were apt ever to forget the night on which we first saw Dr. Pettit, the night of my first "party" when the maid in the apartment across the hall from ours brought in a baby suffering with convulsions to us. The baby would have died without Lillian's quickness in administering a hot water bath and the skill of Dr. Pettit, whom we hastily summoned.

Dr. Pettit Joins the Picnic.

Dr. Pettit, it appeared, was waiting for the same car we wished to take, and no one looking at our friendly chatting group would have known that he did not belong to the party.

It was when we were all seated comfortably in the trolley bowling merrily over the grass-strewn track that Lillian voiced a suggestion which had sprung into my own mind, but to which I did not know quite how to give utterance.

"Look here," she said brusquely, "I'm not the hostess of this party, but I'm practically one of the family, so I feel free to issue an invitation if I wish. Dr. Pettit, what's the matter with your joining our party for the day? Dicky here has been howling for another man to help lug the grub all morning. Unless you are set on a solitary day that may migat as well be you."—she punctuated the parody with a mocking little moue.

I had a sneaking little notion that Dicky would have been glad of the opportunity to box Lillian's ears for her suggestion. I do not think he enjoyed the idea of adding Dr. Pettit to the party, but, of course, in view of what she had said there was nothing for him to do but to pretend a cordial acquiescense in her suggestion.

"That's the very thing," he said with a heartiness which only I, and possibly Lillian, could dream was assumed. "Lil, you do occasionally have a gleam of human intelligence, don't you?

"I do hope you have no plan that will interfere with your coming with us," he turned to the physician. "We have a big boat chartered down here at the beach, and we're going to loaf along out to one of the 'desert islands' and camp for the day."

"That sounds like a most interesting program," said the young physician. His voice held a note of hesitation, and he looked swiftly, inquiringly, at me and back again. It was so carelessly done that I do not think anyone noticed it, but I realized that he was waiting for me to join my voice in the invitation.

Madge's "Deadly Rivals."

"I trust you will think it interesting enough to make it worth your while to join us," I said demurely, lifting my eyes to his and catching a swift flash of something which might be either relief or triumph in his steely gray ones.

"Indeed, I shall be very glad to accompany you," he said, smiling.

"He doesn't look husky enough to me," drawled Harry Underwood. "If you're going to put an extra man on the job of carrying bundles, Dicky, why don't you wait and get a dock walloper?"

Dr. Pettit flushed a bit at the other man's banter. I could see that he was not used to the kind of rough raillery in which Harry Underwood so often indulged.

"Never mind putting over any more of that Georgie Cohan stuff," Lillian put in caustically, "remember Dr. Pettit isn't so used to your peculiar kind of humor as the rest of us are."

"I don't care a hoot whether he likes my style or not," her husband retorted, rebelliously, with a good-natured grin at Dr. ePttit. "I'll probably have to bash his head in before the day's over with, anyway, for I can see with half an eye that we are to be deadly rivals." He pointed his cryptic utterance with a malicious little grimace at me.

I felt myself flush hotly. Dr. Pettit's face was unsmiling, as if he had not seen any humor in the reference. I could not tell whether Dicky had heard the speech or not, for he, Grace Draper and the Durkees were engaged in animated conversation.

But as we walked along the crazy planking of the wharf to where our boat waited, Lillian found an opportunity to squeeze my arm rapturously, "You sly puss," she murmured. "No man but your brother-cousin and Dicky interested in you, eh? Don't ever hand me anything like that again."
