CHAPTER CCLXII

HOW HARRY'S "WHAT YOU ALL NEED IS SOMETHING TO STIR Miss Draper, had been called away YOU UP" WAS ANSWERED.

Grace Draper's condition rapidly grew worse after she had released me from my promise to stay with her until her death. From the moment when Dr. Pettit uncovered the sham of the delirium she was affecting in order to make me believe Dicky was false to me, she sank rapidly into real unconsciousness, real delirium. The fight for her life was a bitter and prolonged one. Authorized by his homecoming and the hour when night and day by the best skill ob- ume of terror and tragedy. tainable. But I had no personal knowledge of the desperate struggle that was nally gathered within the friendly being waged for the girl's life. Back in Marvin, under Lillian's kindly ministrations, my nerves, well nigh shattered by the harrowing experiences I had gone through, were slowly being healed. When we found that the fight for Grace Draper's life was to be a long summoning all the strength she had and a grim one, Lillian decided it in one last attempt to poison my bewould be best for Dicky and me to lief in Dicky. She had said that nevreturn to the old Brennan house at er would I be able to tell just how Marvin. From that day until the day Lillian and I returned, Katle had come out to Marvin from the city early each morning, stayed during the day to give the house a semblance of occupation, and returned to the city each evening, where she had slept at the home of her cousin, her only relative in the city. Lillian ad also persuaded Grace Draper's sister, Mrs. Gorman, to return to her home. It was not hard to induce the poor woman to do so, for she was almost useless in the
