REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

The Story of a Honeymoon

A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by ADELE GARRISON

CHAPTER CCLXIV

WHY MADGE'S DEFENSE OF HER GUESTS WON MOTHER GRAHAM AT LAST.

When I faced my mother-in-law across the dining room table of our home in Marvin and commanded her to stop the insults she was hurling at Lillian Underwood, I felt as if I had been emancipated from a domination that had been most irksome to me.

I do not think that I had realized myself how much I had secretly feared my mother-in-law and her domineering ways until her insulting words to Lillian Underwood so angered me that I could control myself no longer.

My mother-in-law made one last attempt to carry her point.

"Richard," she said, ignoring me, "you promised me this woman should never enter your house or associate with your wife."

I saw Lillian cast one reproachful glance at Dicky, saw Harry Underwood's face flush with indignant contempt. My heart ached for Dicky as I saw a mortified flush spread over his face.

He opened his lips to answer his mother, but I prevented his speaking by taking the floor myself.

"Mother Graham," I said, slowly and with deadly calmness, "we will have this out right here and now. In the first place, let me tell you that you wrested that promise from Dicky when you were so ill that the physician had warned us any excitement or denial of your wishes might cause your death. It was distinctly a promise made under duress, and Dicky never meant to carry it out."

Across the faces of my husband and the Underwoods flashed a look of smiling relief, but my mother-in-law's face was still black.

"You poor, deluded child," she said, "you are making a fearful mistake; you did not know—"

"I know everything," I said sternly. "I know there is not a nobler woman, a truer friend in the world than Lillian Underwood, whom you have chosen to insult tonight. I know everything of her past and Dicky's there is to know. If you were not so blinded by your own harshness you would know it, too."

"Margaret!" My mother-in-law's voice was harsh with anger. She put out her hand with the old imperious gesture that had once been sufficient to overawe me. But I paid no attention whatever to either word or gesture.

"I am proud," I rushed on, "to count Lillian Underwood as the best friend I have. If, instead of basing your prejudice against her upon silly rumor, you had taken the trouble to find out the real facts in the case, you would know that your son was eternally indebted to her."

"I decline to listen to any more of this hysteria, and I demand that these people leave the house at once."

Mother Graham's Decision.

Harry Underwood and Dicky both started toward us with flushed faces. Lillian, calm, watchful, made an almost imperceptible gesture with her hand, and the two men stepped back.

Lillian saw, as I did, that the elder woman was in the throes of one of her "tantrums" and that her anger was carrying her father than she intended, making her utter words of which she would be ashamed later.

I determined to end the whole scene with a quick, sharp ultimatum. I went a step nearer to my mother-in-law, faced her unflinchingly.

"Mother Graham," I said, slowly, sternly, "I cannot allow you any longer to insult my friends. I am Dicky's wife, remember, and I am mistress here. I hoped never to have to remind you of this. I am sorry to have to do it now. You are welcome to stay with Dicky and me as long as you live. I will do everything I can to be a dutiful, loving daughter to you, but I cannot and will not ever let you dictate to me again as to the friends we receive into our home, or any other individual affair of mine."

I had looked her steadily in the eyes all the time I was talking to her. Former experiences with my mother-in-law had taught me that she knew when she had failed in any project, and accepted defeat grudgingly, so I was not surprised to see her turn my gaze with a calm, defiant look and then turn away as indifferently as if we had been discussing the weather.

"Richard," she said shortly, "are you going to stand there staring all night? Take my bag up to my room. The man set it on the porch."

while she was gone. I knew that if there were one thing more than another calculated to revive her anger it would be the sight of his clothes and smoking things in her room. The same thought evidently struck Lillian and Harry also.

Lillian, however, was equal to the emergency. With a quick gesture to me, unseen by my mother-in-law, to detain the elder woman for a few moments in the dining room, she summoned Harry to her side with a signal from her eyes which he evidently understood, and they both slipped out of the room.

"Do have something to eat and a cup of hot tea before you go upstairs," I said as deferentially as I knew how, while Dicky, who had also caught Lillian's signalling, seconded my invitation.

"Yes, mother, eat something first, you must be famished."

To my great relief she consented to sit down to the table. She was evidently hungry, and she did such justice to Katie's delicious meal that when we finally escorted her upstairs to her room there was no trace whatever in it of Harry Underwood's occupancy.

Dicky and I hovered near the door like two frightened children. We were not quite sure as to just the method by which the elder woman would retreat from the position she had taken concerning the Underwoods.

"Don't stand there looking as if you had been stealing jam," my mother-in-law said tartly, as she turned around from the mirror. "I'm tired and want to go to sleep, so you do not need to keep your friends waiting any longer."

We wasted no time in availing ourselves of the permission. As she closed the door behind us Dicky caught me in his arms.

"What a little spitfire!" he said, admiringly. "I didn't know it was in you."

His voice grew deeper as he pressed me closer to him.

"I'm finding out lots of things about my wife nowadays," he said lovingly, and kissed me.

Aviators Apply for Jobs With Forestry Department

Under the impression that Oregon will make use of airplanes in forest patrol work, several young flyers who have had recent training in the United States army have applied to State Forester F. A. Elliott for employment during the coming summer. While airplane patrol is said to be the most effective known for detecting forest fires there is little probability of its being established immediately in this state.

State Forester Elliott is now in Lincoln county attending a meeting of the Lincoln County Fire Patrol association which is making plans to forestall fires during the coming dry period.
