REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

The Story of a Honeymoon

A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by ADELE GARRISON

CHAPTER CCCIX

WHAT MADGE AND DICKY FOUND HIDDEN IN THE DEPTHS OF THE WOODS.

I scrupulously kept my bargain with Dicky to "forget everything else save fishing for the rest of the day." Resolutely putting out of my mind all thoughts of the queer stranger I had met or the exciting mystery at the Cosgrove farmhouse in which we were involved, I started up the stream at his side, determined to let nothing interfere with my enjoyment of my first trout expedition.

Not that I had any need for resolution to keep my mind upon my rod and reel. The fascination of the sport had gripped me, and in a few moments I was oblivious to everything else in the world save the beautiful tumbling mountain stream in the Catskills and the finny trophies we were wrestling from its pools.

For I had "beginner's luck," which Dicky, though not a novice shared. The first trout in my creel which the queer unknown had helped me get was soon joined by others equally large, while Dicky landed three speckled beauties in rapid succession.

"Madge, you're a mascot!" he exclaimed, as he deposited the last one in his creel, after an exciting tussle in which the fish nearly got away. "I've whipped this stream many times, but I never had such good luck before. I've got to slip it to you on this proposition, too. For a beginner you cast marvellously well. You take to this thing as a fish does to water."

"You mean as these fish would like to take to water," I corrected mischievously. The little quip was silly enough, but Dicky appeared to find it highly amusing, his loud laughter echoing weirdly among the trees.

"That's a good one," he declared, and then, coming impulsively over toward me, he drew me into a roughly tender embrace.

They Find a Path.

"You're a bully little woods pal, sweetheart," he said, rubbing his cheek against mine. "I'm awfully sorry I was so shabby at first. I was a selfish beast, and it served me right to lose the chance to help you land your first trout."

I put my hand against his lips. "Let's not spoil a perfect moment by remembering anything, unpleasant or pleasant," I said softly.

Dicky drew me closer and kissed me for answer. I returned his kiss with a feeling of blissful content I had not experienced for weeks. The shadow of Grace Draper's terrible act, and the furtive doubt she had planted in my mind, which had been with me for so long, slunk away as if exorcised by the bracing air and wonderful beauty in which we stood. It was one of my rare moments of perfect happiness, and it gave a zest to every remaining moment of the day.

It was late in the afternoon when we finally turned our footsteps toward the Cosgrove farmhouse and supper. Mrs. Cosgrove had put us up a substantial luncheon, but the autumn air, heady as champagne, had sharpened our appetites until the one thing more desirable to us than catching trout was the eating of them.

"Hello, here's a path leading up," Dicky exclaimed in relief, after he had nearly twisted his ankle in the creeping vines that twined among the underbrush. "By Jove, Madge, look here, how's this for a Fennimore Cooper situation?"

I stepped to his side and saw what he meant in an instant. The path was arranged so that it could be masked by a sort of curtain of vines which had been carefully cut and trimmed until it hung over the underbrush in such a manner as effectually to conceal the little track and yet be easily pushed aside by any one in the secret. It was so cleverly constructed that we would never have discovered it if Dicky, walking close to the underbrush, in order to make his foot in the vine had not caught his foot in the vine curtain and slightly torn it.

"We'll just see where this leads to," Dicky said, and I knew by his tone and his sparkling eyes that he was both curious and excited. "Ready for an adventure, Madge?" "An Easily Explained Mystery?"

"Of course," I returned, as eager and excited as he, and we walked up the path, first carefully replacing the vine curtain which marked its entrance.

The track wound upward through the trees in zigzag fashion, and there were many by-paths branching from it, which went only a few feet into the underbrush.

"Looks as if whoever made this had taken a good deal of pains to mix up the trail," Dicky commented as we neared the top of the bank.

I nodded, too excited to speak, and then all at once the path twisted around a huge oak and led us directly to a little clearing in the underbrush, sheltered from all sides from observation by the trees and further protected by a high fence to which the only entrance was a locked gate facing us.

There were several small buildings in the enclosure, one a long, low greenhouse, through whose windows we could see the gleam of flowers, others, kennels, out of which some magnificent dogs leaped, growling, and in the center a tiny dwelling with closely drawn curtains.

"An easily explained mystery after all," Dicky said, and his tone held a note of disappointment. "Cosgrove is probably an up-to-date chap who raises rare flowers and breeds thoroughbred dogs to eke out his income, and takes no chance of having his plants or pups stolen."

"What the —! Well, I'll be —!" What Dicky would be I did not hear. I was too much absorbed in staring at the shaking curtain of a window in the little house.

For a moment before it had been lifted cautiously, and straight into our eyes had gazed the wild, excited brown orbs of the mysterious brown-bearded stranger who had helped me to catch my first trout.

State Penitentiary Is Inspected by Officials

In spite of the dilapidated condition of the buildings at the state penitentiary, Governor Olcott declared that he looks for an improvement in conditions under Warden R. E. Lee Steiner. After an inspection of the prison buildings and grounds with Warden Steiner and Don H. Upjohn, private secretary to the executive, Governor Olcott yesterday issued the following statement:

Alkali in Shampoos Bad for Washing Hair

Most soaps and prepared shampoos contain too much alkali, which is very injurious, as it dries the scalp and makes the hair brittle.

The best thing to use is mulberry cocoon oil shampoo, for this is pure and entirely greaseless. It's very cheap and beats anything else all to pieces. You can get this at any drug store, and a few ounces will last the whole family for months.

Simply moisten the hair with water and rub it in, about a teaspoonful is all that is required. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, cleanses thoroughly, and rinses out easily. The hair dries quickly and evenly, and is soft, fresh-looking, bright fluffy, wavy and easy to handle. Besides, it loosens and takes out every particle of dust, dirt and dandruff.

clares that he looks for an improvement in conditions under Warden R. E. Lee Steiner. After an inspection of the prison buildings and grounds with Warden Steiner and Don H. Upjohn, private secretary to the executive, Governor Olcott yesterday issued the following statement:

"We put in the afternoon with

Warden Steiner inspecting the physical properties of the penitentiary. Dr. Steiner has not much to work on there as the buildings are so antiquated and in such a condition of dilapidation that they are practically beyond repair. To expend much money in an attempted rehabilitation would be, in our opinion, mighty poor business. Bad as the situation is as we find it and meagre tools offered for its accomplishment, nevertheless I confidently look to an early and decided general improvement."
