SUMMER CROPS IN FRAMES.

The hotbeds and coldframes in the average garden are allowed to stand empty or grow up to weeds after the spring vegetable plants are removed. In the small garden especially, this space should not be wasted. The soil in the frames is generally heaviiy manured so that it will produce luxuriant agrowth. Of course there is no need for the sash or covering of the frames in growing summer crops, although these may be replaced in the fall to give protection to the crop growing in the im It will be surprising to most gardeners to find how much a summer crop will produce even in a 5 x 12 foot hotbed.

One of the best crops to grow in frames in summer is celery. The plants may be set during June, the seedlings having been started at least two months before. Spacing 6 x 8 inches apart, over 200 plants can be set in a 6 x 12 foot bed, which is more celery than the average family consumes in a year. Another advantage of this scheme is that the celery may be blanched and stored for winter use by simply placing the covers over the frame, and covering this with straw or some other material to exclude the light.

Other vegetables that will succeed when set in frames are egg-plants, peppers, and bush squash. Three or four plants of each may be set in the frame in the spring about the time tomatoes, etc, are being set outdoors vegetables. Onions or sweet cora, frame. Any vegetable growing in frames during the summer needs watering and some cultivation to keep down weeds. With this small amount of care, quite a few extra vegetables can be grown. Wherever there is a hotbed or coldframe, the gardener should not overlook this opportunity to make use of it in summer.
