

REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

The Story of a Honeymoon

A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by ADELE GARRISON

HOW MADGE TOLD MRS. COSGROVE ABOUT HER SUSPICIONS OF MRS. ALLIS.

Mr. Cosgrove was open-mouthed with dismay when Dicky faced the official fish warden with the assertion that Mrs. Allis was the person who had given the information upon which Drake had based our arrest for trouting out of season.

"Oh, you can't mean Mrs. Allis," he said, looking around the room in bewildered fashion. "You must be mistaken. Why, that little woman has the kindest heart in the world. She wouldn't hurt a fly."

"I'm not so sure about that," Cosgrove struck into the conversation. She had entered the room some time before, but had said nothing, contenting herself with giving me a cheery, encouraging nod and smile, which, to me, were worth whole reams of conversational condolences from the average woman.

"Why, Mother!" The big man looked at his wife in ludicrous wonderment. The gaze she turned upon him was an illuminative one, the loving maternal, half-pitying, half-contemptuous look one would give a silly boy. My heart went out to the sweet-faced, care-worn woman, who, I could see, had been hurt and annoyed by Mrs. Allis's careless, malicious coquetry toward Mr. Cosgrove, and the big man's lumbering, sheepish acceptance of the woman's advances.

"I mean it," she returned with conviction. "And she has some deep reason for doing what she has done, too. I don't believe she is up here for any good."

Dicky turned to me where I was still standing behind him, for I had a vague aversion to getting any nearer to the warden, Drake.

"The time has come, the walrus said," he murmured. I nodded assent with instant comprehension of his meaning, and he turned back to the little group with a sudden assumption of authority.

"I Can't Plead—I—"

"You are eminently correct, Mrs. Cosgrove," he said quietly. "Accidentally Mrs. Graham and I have stumbled upon the real reason for Mrs. Allis' presence in your home. If Mrs. Cosgrove's friend, the attorney who is on his way here, can persuade Mr. Drake that Mrs. Graham's presence is not necessary at the justice court, she will tell you everything we have discovered. It is a matter only for yourselves, however; outsiders can have no possible concern in it."

Reading between the lines of Dicky's speech I saw that he was determined to see the expected theft of the pictures by Mrs. Allis and her accomplice through to the finish, without the aid of the police or any other authorities. My cue, of course, was silence, except to Mrs. Cosgrove, but I thrilled with excitement at the prospect of the tale I had to tell her.

It seemed hours before the lawyer summoned by Mr. Cosgrove arrived, but it really was only a few minutes before an auto whizzed up to the gate and an intelligent, serious-looking young man alighted and hurried to the house.

Then there were introductions and conferences. Dicky talked for some time with the attorney, and I guessed that under the seal of the profession he was telling the lawyer of the plot we had discovered and Mrs. Allis's reason for denouncing us. There was another conference with Dicky, the attorney and the warden as participants, and then Dicky came over to me.

"It's all settled, Madge," he whispered cheerfully. "I'll introduce you to the attorney, you instruct him to plead 'not guilty' for you, and that will be all there is to it. He'll attend to the rest of the case for us. If things go right here we can force that little Allis cat to go down Monday and withdraw her accusation."

"But Dicky," I returned dismayed. "I can't plead 'not guilty,' I was trouting, you know."

"Will you shut up?" Dicky demanded in a savage whisper. "Do you want to spoil everything with those antiquated Puritan scruples of yours? Nobody's asking you to give any evidence, or swear to anything. Pleading 'not guilty' is simply a legal form. All prisoners are supposed to do it even when proof is blackest against them."

"It Cannot Be!"

I wanted to let myself be convinced by Dicky's sophistry, but my conscience troubled me sorely as I acknowledged Dicky's introduction of me to the lawyer, and answered the few questions he put to me. It was a relief when the men left the house and Mrs. Cosgrove, after a hasty look at the roasting ducks in her kitchen oven, came back to the living room and drew her chair close to mine before the fire, evidently ready for the confidence of Dicky had promised.

I omitted nothing from the story which I thought she ought to know. Beginning with my first suspicion of Mrs. Allis when a momentary look in her eyes had told me that she feared Dicky's knowledge of the value of the pictures which made a glory of the living room. I told her of the conversation in the woods between Mrs. Allis and her accomplice which Dicky and I had overheard, and of her invitations to drink tea with her nightly in her rooms, of which Dicky was afraid.

Only once did Mrs. Cosgrove interrupt me—at the point in Mrs. Allis's conversation with her accomplice when he had protested that Goldstein, evidently their New York principal—was "getting a bit weary" and didn't see how she was going to get away with so many of the pictures without their being traced.

"There's something about this business that even Goldstein doesn't know," the woman had replied. "Something he isn't going to know until I get good and ready to tell him. It's something that will make him sit up and take notice, I promise you."

"Please say that over again," Mrs. Cosgrove asked, "and say it slowly." She sat with her eyes closed as I spoke, and for so long afterward that I would have thought she had fallen asleep save for her deeply knitted brows.

"I wonder if it could be possible," she mused aloud at last. "No, no, it cannot be. That would be too cruel."

WAS ON A TORPEDOED SHIP

Thomas A. Breslin, 645 Broadway, Albany, N. Y., writes: "Having been on a torpedoed ship coming to this country from England, I had a cold ever since. I was advised by a friend to take Foley's Honey and Tar and before long I was cured." You can stop that cough or cold that has been lingering since spring.—J. C. Perry.

LABOR ORGANIZATION BALKS AT REVOLUTION FROM THE MANUFACTURER

Whether you are in sympathy with organized labor or not, you cannot shut your eyes to certain facts. It has been shown in other ways that trades unionism balks at the red flag.

It had also stood firmly against the efforts of I. W. W. to invade its ranks and prostitute its cause.

To say this is not to support mistaken labor leaders in all their purposes and in all their acts.

It is simply to recognize the demonstrated facts.

Labor organized and unorganized has no more dangerous and destructive enemy than I. W. W. ism.

What becomes of the right to collective bargaining when the wage system has been abolished?

What becomes of the ability of capital to employ labor when all capital has been abolished?

The American Federation of Labor under the leadership of its national heads balks at revolution.

They do not recognize any right of affiliation between unionism and red radicalism in any form.

Wage earners who save part of their money and who accumulate savings in homes or land cannot be Bolsheviks.

They become part of the despised bourgeoisie or property-owning class, that the Reds say must be exterminated.

The red extremists are doing their utmost to break into the ranks of unionism and make converts to anarchy.

They say the products of industries belong to the industries themselves and to labor; because labor creates all wealth and what it creates it owns.

Abraham Lincoln made rails for 25 cents per hundred but no one but an I. W. W. would claim that the rails belonged to the laborer who made 'em.

At Seattle the Reds tried to transform an ordinary controversy over the Macy Wage board findings into a national revolution.

When the Reds showed their real purpose, showed the red hand, organized labor became alarmed and began to think and went back to work.

Many begin to see elements of conservatism in such actions of organized labor.

There is a distinct cleavage between the industrial purposes of trade unions and the aims of the I. W. W.

But where is the line drawn between organized Socialism and the organized menace of destructivism and its propaganda of sabotage?

Making the main business of its existence to organize strikes, whether there be any cause or not, trade unions balk at I. W. W. ism.

Expression of sympathy with sedition, subversion of state and federal government, crippling private industries, are not trade union teachings.

Democratic Congressman Martin Dies of Texas rightly calls Socialism the galloping consumption of the nation.

Under Socialism industries are to be eliminated, the state is to be eliminated, the family is to be eliminated.

Life has little enough to offer the toilers at best, but what is there left after you have eliminated the best we have?

Shall we stand by what we have accomplished and accomplish more and better and greater results for industries in the American way?

Or shall we turn from the lights of experience, wander from the plain highway on which the nation has travelled, and follow the Reds?

It is squarely up to every man and every woman who enjoy the liberties of free institutions to decide this question for themselves.

sions, will open the 29 as originally scheduled, at Columbus. The railroad administration has fixed a rate of one and one-third fare for the round trip to Columbus. Methodism in every community in America is expected to be represented at this gigantic exposition. Methodist district superintendents from every district in the United States will be in attendance for the meeting at which future church work will be laid out, and it is estimated that 75 per cent of Methodist pastors, with representatives from Methodist churches everywhere, will be present at the meeting. The celebration will last several weeks. Preparations have been made to take care of 100,000 to 150,000 persons a day. Applications for hotel reservations are sent to the celebration committee, at Columbus, Ohio.

A unique feature in connection with the celebration is the motor caravan. Transportation experts are engaged in routing these various automobile caravans, and it is estimated that 40,000 machines will convey approximately 175,000 visitors to the religious exposition. That the caravan idea is a popular one with automobile owning church members is evidenced by the fact that reports of the formation of new caravans is received daily at the centenary celebration headquarters. One of these will start from Springfield, Ill., with 1,000 automobiles enlisted.

MOHAIR AND WOOL

With mohair selling at 45 to 50 cents a pound this season, the gora goat owners in Lane county, Oregon, will receive about $30,000 on their clip; and the sheep owners expect to sell about $40,000 worth of wool at prices ranging from 40 to 67 cents a pound.
