REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

The Story of a Honeycomb

A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by ADELE GARRISON

CHAPTER CCCXXIV

WHAT HAPPENED WHEN ROBERT SAVARIN SAID "THAT RESTS ENTIRELY WITH THE LADY."

IF the woman who had pretended to be Robert Savarin's wife possessed a vivid imagination she must have had a swift mental picture of herself in the prisoner's dock of a courtroom as the cold, pitiless words of the man who had once believed himself to be her husband fell upon her ears.

There was an absolute lack of emotion in the ton's of the man who had suffered so terribly on account of the woman he was confronting as he outlined the offense against him, of which she had been guilty.

I had a flashing mental picture of the terrible sufferings which must have been this man's 15 years before. "A wail of the studios" his sister had called the woman with whom her brother had fallen madly in love, whom he had rescued from the life she had been living, to whom he had given an unparalleled devotion and the shelter of his name, and who in return had deceived him in regard to a previous marriage, ruined him by her extravagance and escapades, and had finally deserted him when he had nothing more to give her.

And now, after years lost to him with the clouding of his brain, he had at last found her in the home of the sister who had cared for him a very thief in the night, attempting to take the picture which were all that remained of his life's work. I think the realization finally reached the woman confronting him that every vestige of her power over him was gone, and that the attitude in which he now stood before her was that of a just and emotionless judge in whom pity had no part.

I saw her moisten her lips with her tongue, and then she spoke, steadily enough, for all the deadly fear that must have possessed her. "Well," she said, tonelessly, "you evidently have all the cards in your hands. What are you going to do?"

In the Hands of Madge.

And then Robert Savarin made a most amazing reply: "That rests entirely with the lady whom you tried to attack so viciously on the night you were rescued a few moments ago," he said. "I am free from you, that you have absolutely no claim upon me, and that I am actually prevent you from ever annoying me again is all that I wish. But this lady's wishes are another matter. From what I have overheard, I understand that you have given her much needless trouble and annoyance. If she chooses to use the evidence she has in her hands against you I have no alternative but to consent, for I understand she has been instrumental in saving my pictures."

I cannot imagine a punishment more bitter to the proud woman who stood before us than the humiliation of a divorce.
