CHAPTER CCCLVI

WHAT DR. PETTIT SAID TO MADGE

Dicky stopped his wild rush along want to hear the president speak. the floor of Madison Square Garden They want to hear themselves yell," so suddenly that I expected to see Dr. Pettit muttered in a disgusted him take a header over the man neartone to himself and I agreed with est him. His face held so chaotic a him. mixture of emotions that I almost laughed outright. Relief, chagrin. bewilderment, rage, all were reflected in his face and eyes. For a moment he stood perfectly motionless, glaring up at me where I sat in the small balcony with Dr. Pettit. Then he snapped his fingers with a gesture that I knew meant the beginning of one of his uncontrollable rages and. turning on his heel, disappeared in the crowd. For a moment I could hardly believe my eyes. It surely was incredible that Dicky, after summarily leaving me in a mob such as that which swirled around Madison Square Garden on the night of the president's speech there, should resent my being under the protection of Dr. Pettit,

Common sense ought to have told him that I must have met Dr. Pettit by accident in the crowd; common decency ought to have made him grateful that I had found some one to protect me from the terrible crush of the crowd after he had left my side to rescue a girl he knew from the danger of being killed. But I had lived with Dicky long enough to realize that when he was in the grip of one of his unreasonable fits of temper nothing else mattered. P reasoned that as soon as he had seen to the safety of the girl he had rescued that he had begun a search for me. That he had been wild with anxiety I could tell from his at- rate of six o: more a week until comtitude as he rushed around the au- pleted, Chairman Hurley said. As ditorium below.
