HOW MOTHER GRAHAM ROSE TO A PLEASANT OPPORTUNITY

"Where are you going, my pretty

Harry Underwood sprang to his his arm and accompany her. I could feet as I entered the living room, Of not help but smile to myself as he went out, for he looked like a recourse, Dicky and Alfred Durkee did the same thing, but it was Mr. Underwood who with his long stride advanced quickly in front of the others and barred my path, looking down at me with the indefinable look in his brilliant black eyes that always makes me shiver. "To kiss Mrs. Durkee, sir, she said," I answered in as mocking a tone as his own; and courtesying low, sprang aside more quickly than he appreciate any evidence of his had thought possible and lightly dodged the outflung arms with which he had made a barrier against elaborate in exhibiting the flowers my passing.

The light, mocking elusion was part of the treatment of Harry Underwood that I had long ago outlined for myself. He was Dicky's best friend, the husband of my dearest comrade, Lillian. To take seriously, or to show offense at the burlesqued admiration which he constantly offered me was not to be thought of unless I wanted a rupture between the two families.

"Foiled again, Harry." I heard Dicky say as I reach Mrs. Durkee's side and apologized for not having come sooner to greet her. The light laughter which accompanied his remark grated upon me when I contrasted Dicky's indifference to the badinage of Harry Underwood with his foolish jealousy of any other man who evinced the slightest interest in

"Lucky Mrs. Durkee." Harry Underwood returned extravagantly, and my greeting of the pretty, motherly little woman whom I genuinely liked. was marred by the consciousness that the man I unaccountably feared was watching my every movement. I did not allow myself to dwell upon the vagaries of Harry Underwood, however. I knew that if I

"I wish to speak to you seriously, Dicky." I said, trying to make my voice gay and careless. "and Mr. Durkee, you are wanted at your mother's side." Harry Underwood flashed shrewd, understanding glance at me.

a look which followed me as I stepped aside with Dicky, and which changed into a mocking, bitter smile as Dicky unable to control himself at my news sounded a long whistling note, and then, before I could stop him, demanded loudly, "What in Sam Hill did she do that for?" "Your query is a perfectly logical one, my young friend," Mr. Underwood sneered, and I never heard his voice so unpleasant. "And I can
