A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by ADELE GARRISON

CHAPTER CCCCIX
WHY DRAKE SAID, "IT'S USELESS TO DENY IT."

I was glad to be seated when Mr. Drake, the stranger whom Dicky had brought home to dinner, leaned forward in his chair and asked if I knew why my father had changed his name. I know that if I had never standing my knees would never have supported me, so terrified was I at the knowledge of my father's secret which this stranger evidently had, and meant me to know he possessed. True, he had not said in so many words that he knew that Robert Gordon was my father, but his whole manner, his deliberation when he uttered the words: "Charles Robert Gordon Spencer?" Can you know any light upon the gentleman's reason for changing his name—Mrs. Margaret Spencer Graham?" told me that he was in possession of my father's secret.

But I was resolved to yield no hint of my own knowledge unless I was forced to do so. I waited until my voice was steady, and then said: "You are talking very strangely, Mr. Drake. I do not understand you nor can I imagine any reason why you should adopt so melodramatic a manner of addressing me."

Into Mr. Drake's eyes there flashed the same look of sympathetic admiration I had caught before. Then he clasped his hands together softly. I realized from the gesture and the words which followed that he had no intention of letting Dicky gain any hint of the subject we were discussing.

"I Admit Nothing."

"Bravo! little lady!" he said, and his low tones did not disguise the genuine enthusiasm in his voice. "I like you wherever I find it, and you surely have your share of gameness and resourcefulness. I'd like to have you working with me instead of against me. But I'll have to tell you plainly that your wonderfully clever little air of misunderstanding my meaning won't do. I see I shall have to lay my cards on the table after all."

He paused a moment, and I realized in that moment of waiting how a charmed bird must feel waiting for the doom it cannot move a muscle to escape.

"You are the daughter of the man who calls himself Robert Gordon—Mrs. Graham," he said slowly at last. "It is useless for you to deny it. I have absolute proof of the truth of what I am saying. Whether or not you do not know, nor do I care. The only thing which concerns me is the gentleman's present address, and that is what I am sure you will give me."

The absolute certainty of his tones maddened me. I sprang to my feet and faced him, quivering with anger.

"You are utterly mistaken," I said. "I admit nothing you have said, and under no circumstances should I give you Mr. Gordon's address even if I had it."

The sound of Dicky's footsteps descending the stairs came distinctly to both our ears. Mr. Drake altered his manner in a moment, and he said: "We will discuss this again before I leave, but I do not wish to quarrel with you. May I point out to you that it would be very unwise for you to involve your husband in this matter? If I guess correctly, and I think I do, he does not know as much about your father as you do, and the knowledge I do not imagine would add much to his general peace of mind."

A Hidden Menace?

The next moment he had turned to the door and greeted Dicky with a merry quip as far removed as possible from the half-veiled sinister threat he had given me. And not once during the remainder of the evening did he refer in any manner to Robert Gordon.

But I—I lay awake almost all of the night by Dicky's side trying hard to keep from waking him by my restlessness. For a deadly fear was upon me, not so much the fear for my father's safety, as a dread that he hid the mystery of his long absence in South America lay something sinister, criminal.

Should I tell Dicky my fears? This was the question I thrashed out at length during the long wakeful hours. Of course Dicky knew that my father's name was not Robert Gordon, but in telling him I had minimized the earnestness with which my father had urged me to tell no one but Dicky and Lillian of his identity as Charles Spencer. I knew from his manner that when Mr. Drake spoke of Robert Gordon that he had no thought of anything but idle curiosity behind the questions.

I did not like to share even the semblance of a secret with this stranger, but there was a menace in his talk of my father that I could not understand, and which I finally made up my mind to heed. I resolved to keep my own counsel, even from my husband, until I was certain just what danger to my father lay behind the stranger's words.
