REVELATIONS OF A WIFE The Story of a Honeymoon

A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by ADELE GARRISON

CHAPTER CCCCXXXIV

WHAT IS IT THAT TROUBLES LILLIAN UNDERWOOD?

"For heaven's sake, Madge. What what on earth do you mean by that?"

My husband scowled at me in bewilderment when I told him that I was afraid we would have to leave Lillian Underwood out of our plans for entertaining Robert Savarin. He had good reason for being puzzled, for months before we had discussed the subject of the artist's return to the world from which he had been absent so long, Lillian had been enthusiastic in her plans for entertaining him.

Dicky did not know that during the illness following my burns upon the night of his birthday dinner, Lillian had told me of her youthful romantic adoration of Robert Savarin because he had made it possible for her to realize her dreams of becoming an artist. She had also told me that because of her husband's attitude toward her little girl the child of her former tragically unhappy marriage, she and Harry Underwood had almost come to the parting of the ways, and that with her mind and heart so attuned to tragedy she did not think it wise for her to meet Robert Savarin again.

I had kept both secrets from Dicky, for I am not one of the women who believe that confidences from their friends should be retailed to their husbands. But the fact that he was ignorant of Lillian's feelings made it a puzzling matter for me to explain things to him. I took refuge in a subterfuge, something which I loathe, but in which my life with Dicky has made me fairly proficient.

"I don't think she cares to go out much or to meet new people since she has her little girl with her," I explained lamely. "Then, too, Mr. Underwood in South America, and I don't believe she enjoys going without him."

Dicky laughed aloud. "Make Her Come."

"What a prim little Puritan," he said, with the teasing playfulness which always annoys me. "That sure is a scream, Lil not caring to go anywhere because Harry isn't around? Why, that gang they train with wouldn't think it was respectable to be seen too often with your own husband or wife."

"I never saw the Underwoods with anyone else," I retorted a trifle sharply.

"That's because you never saw much of them outside our own home," Dicky shot back. "But they always were mild compared to the rest of that bunch. Come to think of it, there may be something to your dope after all. Lil hasn't been out much since Harry left. It must be on account of the kid, though; I don't believe her life is so bound up in old Harry's as to make her take the veil."

Dicky's mocking tone made me realize that he had no illusions concerning the state of the Underwoods' marital affection. His next words made me wonder how far he was in Harry Underwood's confidence.

"Never mind what Lil says," he said abruptly. "Just make her come out here while Savarin is here. It will do her good. And she needn't have any scruples on Harry's account. That lad is perfectly capable of attending to his own affairs. I'm about through with him if anybody should happen to ask you."

A Smothered Sob.

I was wise enough to make no comment upon this remark, startling though it was to me. Dicky must be possessed of some knowledge which he had not shared with me regarding Harry Underwood. I knew that the friendship had existed for years between the two men, knew that it would take no light thing to shatter it.

"I will call Lillian after dinner," I hurried to assure him. "Then you can talk to her yourself."

The promise made me most uncomfortable, however. The prospect of summoning Lillian to the telephone to listen to Dicky's rallery over her seclusion grated upon my sense of fair play, and effectually spoiled my dinner. But Lillian herself intervened.

We were just finishing our coffee when the telephone rang. Dicky usually answers it when we are sitting together, but he had seemed unusually tired when he reached home, and he looked so comfortable in his big chair by the fire that I answered it myself.

Lillian's voice came over the wire, husky, strained. I knew by the sound of it that something unusual had come to her.

"Is that you, Madge?" she asked, and then at my affirmative answer she said rapidly, appealingly:

"Can you come over to see me, or may I come to you the first thing tomorrow morning? Something has happened about which I must talk to you. I have no one but you, my dear."

I could hear the break in her voice, and I hastened to give her the assurance for which she asked.

"You know I am ready to do anything you wish, Lillian," I answered. "Would you rather I would come to see you or would you prefer to come here?"

"If it wouldn't inconvenience you too much I wish you could come here," she said.

"I will be there at 10 tomorrow," I assured her.

"You darling," she said brokenly, and as I hung up the receiver I caught the sound of a smothered sob.

Over Three Hundred Towns Visited During Quarter

Over 300 towns in the state were visited during the quarter ending September 30 by representatives of the weights and measures department. In addition to the inspection of scales and measures a large amount of bread, candy, salt, sugar, hay, meat, soap and other articles were weighed and inspected and numerous complaints investigated. The condition of a number of business firms were investigated. Statistics for the quarter follow: Scales inspected, 2697; linear measures inspected, 478; liquid measures inspected, 1972; gas and oil pumps inspected, 523; flour weighed, 22,558 sacks; package goods inspected, 1622 packages; butter weighed, 478 pounds; pottery ware inspected, 6731 pieces; feed weighed, 6629 sacks; canned goods inspected, 1202 cans; berries inspected, 1483 boxes; shingles measured, 256,000; wheat weighed, 164,182 pounds.

With a million dollar building to be erected by the local Elks, the familiar "Hello Bill" becomes more impressive than ever.—Los Angeles Times.
