REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

The Story of a Honeymoon

A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by ADELE GARRISON

CHAPTER CCCXXLIII

Dicky turned from the telephone, his face and eyes betraying the enthusiasm with which he always greets a proposition pleasing to him. He spoke to me hurriedly, still holding the receiver to his ear.

"The Durkees want us to go with them to give those old houses the once over this afternoon," he said, "and then have supper at their house. What do you say?"

"Tell them I'd love to," I responded promptly, and meant exactly what I said. For I enjoy the company of the Durkees very much, and I knew by experience that one of Mrs. Durke's Sunday night suppers was worth a longer trip than the distance from our home to theirs.

"The missus says she'll be charmed," Dicky winked at me impudently as he spoke the words into the receiver. He knows that I detest having him call me "the missus," a favorite pleasantry of his, and that I also dislike the word "charmed," because of its ridiculous overuse on all occasions by all sorts and conditions of people. But I made no sign of distaste, no effort to correct Dicky's diction, as I probably would have done a year ago. Life with Dicky with its big problems, has taught me to overlook many minor annoyances.

"We'll be over before 3 o'clock," Dicky assured his friend at the other end of the telephone and hung up the receiver.

"All's getting in a bit of a wax over those two houses, afraid some one'll beat us to 'em," he grumbled as he turned to me. "He needn't worry, we are probably the only two suckers in all Long Island that would look at 'em. Birdsall's been filling him up with dope about the dozens of eager would-be purchasers from New York that he's holding out for our account, and Alf's swallowing it whole. But we might as well look the places over and decide the matter without any more fuss. Don't you think so?"

"Will Do No Harm."

I was careful not to smile at the unconscious irony of Dicky's asking me to decide about having a house of our own as I answered him. When I had broached the subject of a cherished dream of mine, he had ridiculed it so effectively that I made up my mind never to open the subject again. But when Alfred Durkee had told him of two attractive old neighboring houses near the big new club, one of which he wished to buy himself, Dicky had completely fared about, and appeared quite favorably impressed with the project. I knew my husband well enough not to display the slightest sign of exultation at the prospect of realizing my long cherished desire.

"It certainly will do no harm to look the places over," I said quietly.

Dicky grinned in mischievous comprehension of my real feelings. "Terribly indifferent to prospect of house of her own, isn't she?" he teased. "What's the matter? Afraid I might renege on the whole deal if you showed an undue enthusiasm?"

"Perhaps," I said demurely, and Dicky chuckled. He was in high good humor and I hoped devoutly that nothing would occur to dampen his spirits before he made the final decision concerning the house. It was not that I was unusually at-
