REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

The Story of a Honeymoon

A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by ADELE GARRISON

CHAPTER XXII
WHAT KATHERINE DID TO GET RID OF MRS. ALLIS.

"Well!"

Mrs. Allis' voice was defiant, but her eyes, I saw, held traces of sulen fear as Katherine Sonnet and I came back into the room where she lay. I stepped quickly to the other side of the room, mindful of my promise to Katherine not to interfere with her management of the drug-maddened woman, who had tried to throw acid in my face and then, after being overpowered by Katherine, had threatened to send my father to his death by revealing knowledge she pretended to have.

"Mrs. Graham has left me to deal with you," Katherine told her firmly.

"That's one blessing at any rate," Mrs. Allis interjected. "The very sight of her makes me ill."

The venom in her voice told me how little I could hope from the woman's forbearance if she really did possess knowledge dangerous to my father's safety, and made me glad that Katherine, not I, was dealing with her.

"Ann I've nothing to add to what I've told you before," Katherine went on.

Mrs. Allis looked at her fixedly. Even from my position across the room I could see the defiance fade from Mrs. Allis' eyes, and terror creep into them.

"Oh-h-h!" she moaned. "Not to believe! Someone will be sure to recognize me there. They'll get me there!"

Practically a Prisoner.

Into Katherine's eyes there leaped a light of understanding. Across her face swept a look of relief as if she suddenly saw her way out of the difficulty. She bent over the moaning woman on the bed and took her hand with the tender sympathy which is so characteristic of her work as a nurse.

"My poor woman," she said. "I don't wish to be unduly severe with you, but I must see that you are put under restraint until you get the effects of those drugs out of your system. But fortunately I have an alternative to Bellevue—I can offer you, if on your part you will agree to keep quiet about the things you know and imagine you know."

"Name it," Mrs. Allis said laconically.

"A rich woman who I once nursed," returned Katherine, "and who has always chosen to believe that I saved her life, has the disposal of several rooms in one of the best private sanitariums for drink and drug addicts in the country. It isn't many miles from here. I can arrange for your entrance and treatment there by telephone, and we can motor there in three or four hours."

"Your treatment will cost you nothing, but I warn you that you will be practically a prisoner until I give the word for you to be released. You must also tell those in charge of the place willingly. You'd better think it over for a few minutes, but remember these are the only terms I'll make with you. Either that or arrest and detention in Bellevue 'or jail."

"You Hold All The Cards."

She stepped away from the bed, but Mrs. Allis answered her at once.

"I know when I'm up against it as quick as anybody," she said. "You hold all the cards, and I'll lay down my hand—for the present," she added significantly. "Bring on your private sanitarium. I'd have tried one two or three years ago if I'd had the coin. This seems a pretty good change to get for nothing what I've planned many a time to pay good money for."

"Let me advise you to keep your part of the bargain, and to forget what you think you know," Katherine said, "although it really doesn't matter much what you say. They're used to all sorts of impossible ravings up there."

"I'll remember," Mrs. Allis returned, and then she closed her eyes as if to dismiss the subject.

Katherine beckoned me out of the room, and we crossed the hall into the one where she had slept or had tried to sleep earlier in the night.

"Now comes the problem of setting her out of the house in the quietest way possible," she said practically. "Tell me how much do you want your husband to know of this affair?"

"I wish he didn't need to know anything," I said miserably. "You see, he hasn't a suspicion that there may be something questionable about my father's business, or even Dicky's, but he is naturally impulsive and garrulous. I fear if he knew of Mrs. Allis' attempt on me he would insist on taking things in his own hands and probably upset all you have done."

Katherine frowned at the possibility, then spoke quickly:
