

REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

The Story of a Honeymoon

A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by ADELE GARRISON

CHAPTER DIV

HOW DR. PETTIT ENDED THE STORY MADGE TOLD IN A WAY UNEXPECTED AND STRANGE.

Something in Dr. Pettit's quiet apology for his involuntary criticism of Dicky startled me. The words

"But if you only knew," rang out with such heartfelt emphasis that I wondered just what it was that Dr. Pettit knew and I did not.

Without knowing why, I associated it with the remark he had made about my "divine, mistaken patience and forgiveness" when I told him of

AN INTERESTING TALE

Wandering Story Tellers are helping Community Service in its work for the children in Bridgeport, Connecticut. Dressed like gypsy fortune tellers, the reciters of tales go to the crowded sections of the city. They gather groups of youngsters about them, following the method of the Pied Piper, and then tell their stories. The picture shows a wandering raconteur entertaining a group of boys in a school room.

Hundreds of thousands of boys and girls are affected by the program of Community Service in its country-wide effort to make American communities better places in which to live.

my mother's request to me to forgive my father.

Was it possible that Dr. Pettit knew something concerning my husband which was hidden from me? I knew that the two men had nothing in common save a speaking acquaintance, and that the physician could have no opportunity for intimate knowledge of Dicky's doings.

But he was a man and belonged, as did Dicky, to that realm so mysterious to sheltered women—"the city." Could there be some menace to my happiness in that realm of which I knew so little?

"I Shall Try—"

And now I have reason to believe that my father is in very grave danger of being killed. I finished after I had related my experiences with Allen Drake, the man whom I believed to be the agent of this or some other government on the track of my father.

"I'm keeping nothing back from you," I said. In fact, I am telling you things which I really have no right to tell you. I am violating my father's confidence, but if you are to watch over him, which is the boon I wished to ask you, you ought to know all the circumstances surrounding him.

"I shall try to prove worthy of your confidence," he said, and no oath of allegiance could have been stronger than the simple words.

Outstretched Hands.

I had not spoken the entire truth, however, when I told him that I had kept nothing back from him. The request in my father's letter to give Allen Drake an inclosure if the older man should disappear was not mine to reveal. Both Lillian and I felt that the message was one of tremendous importance which we couldn't understand and we had tacitly agreed never to speak of it. It was nothing that the physician needed to know to protect himself or my father from danger, so I kept silent concerning it.

And then there came to me anew the qualms I had felt about asking Dr. Pettit to do this service for me. In spite of the fact that he had begged me to let him serve me in any way he could, but there was such grave danger in this mission!

"I am afraid," I faltered, "that I ought not to have asked this of you. There may be great danger for you, you know. Believe me, it is only my father's desperate need which impels me to ask such a service of you."

Dr. Pettit stretched his hands across the table to where mine lay and folded them in a tender protective grip. I trembled as he did so, for his eyes were glowing, his face alight.

"Little girl," he said, and his voice was full of tenderness, of more than tenderness, "don't you know that the one thing on earth I desire to do is to serve you?"

I didn't know what to reply. I tried to withdraw my hands, and after an instant, he relinquished them. For a long minute he leaned over the table steadily regarding me, then as if making up his mind to do something momentous, he imprisoned my hands again, before I could snatch them away.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT

Manager Bligh of the Grand theater has secured the distinguished American actor, Mr. Walker Whiteside, for one performance, at which time "The Master of Ballantrae" will be presented at the Grand Opera house. The date of the presentation is Tuesday, February 3, and lovers of Robert Louis Stevenson's immortal story, will have an opportunity to see in flesh and blood, the characters which dominate the tale "The Master of Ballantrae."

Walker Whiteside will appear in the character of James Durie, the adventurous master of the estates of Ballantrae in Scotland. The period of the play is 1756 and the actions transpire on the estates of Lord Durie in Scotland, the exact locality being near St. Brides on the Solway shore.

The handsome costumes of the times will be worn by the star and his associates, and the superb scenes will show the baronial hall in Castle Durisdeer, with its magnificent carvings, pictures, huge fireplace, Jacobean furniture, and superb hangings. Mr. Whiteside will visit Salem immediately after his appearance at the Heilig theatre in Portland.

facturers and lumbermen who supply that branch of the trade, from California, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana and British Columbia met here today and conferred concerning problems connected with the box making industry. Warning was sent to fruit packers and canners which use boxes to get their orders for the coming season in at once if they wish to insure their being filled. Box stock, it was declared, is extremely scarce, an dwith the present pressing demand for all kinds of lumber, the only hope of the box makers for getting what they need is in getting their orders to the mills now.

Should I Wear Glasses?

There's such a thing as wearing glasses when you should not, and not wearing them when you should. It is a mistake to do either.

Many cases of painful eyesight are merely due to a need to wear glasses; or, are caused by the wearing of glasses that do not accurately correct the defect. There are also cases in which, though the right lenses are worn, the good results expected are not realized, because the glasses are not so mounted on the face that the lines of vision and the optical centers of the lenses coincide.

My many years of scientific training and practical experience enable me not only to ascertain the exact nature of your eye trouble but also to apply the exact correction in the right way.
