REVELATIONS OF A WIFE
The Story of a Honeymoon A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by ADELE GARRISON
CHAPTER DXV
WHY MADGE DETERMINED TO TAKE DICKY LITERALLY AT HIS WORD.
I have come to the conclusion that the average man is strangely ignorant of and indifferent to the housekeeping problems of women. All my life long I have heard this argument made by married women, and my life with Dicky has confirmed the theory.
If I lacked proof, however, it was furnished me by Dicky's chavior about the litter of books, magazines and newspapers he juggled down from the attic when I asked him to sort them preparatory to our removal to our new home. Instead of asking me where it would be convenient for me to have them, he brought them straight to the living room and began piling the stuff on the couches, rugs and chairs, with sublime indifference to the small clouds of dust which arose when he put them down.
And when I protested that they would ruin the rugs and furniture, he had growled, "Take the furniture out then!" and added a comment that he didn't intend to freeze while he was sorting the things for me.
"For me?" I retorted. "My memory may be faulty, but I don't recall bringing into the house a single book, magazine or newspaper of the collection you're sorting. If they're mine, the question of their disposal will not take long. I shall simply call up some charity headquarters and ask them to send their wagon down here."
I was surprised at my own temer-ity as the caustic retort left my lips.
Not that I am a particularly patient Griselda, but ever since our reconciliation following the terrible misunderstanding which sent Dicky to San Francisco for so many long weary weeks, I have tried in every way I could to avoid any clash with him. Repeatedly I have choked down replies to his frequent bursts of impatience, replies which any sense of justice and my self-respect told me I should have uttered.

Upon the occasion of my last clash with Dicky, however, when he so rudely refused any explanation of the fervid letter I had found in the hall after he had disposed of the contents of the waste basket, I firmly resolved to pursue different tactics with my temperamental husband. I saw clearly that quiet submission to his whims was the worst possible thing for him and me. It robbed me of my self-respect and intensified the natural arrogance and intolerance of his disposition.
An Unequivocal Reply.
But if I were surprised at my own courage, it was nothing to the amazement depicted on Dicky's countenance as he heard my words. Then the look of angry resentment with which I was only too familiar flashed into his face.
"I've no doubt you would do just that very thing," he said icily, and there was an edge of contempt, simulated or real, in his voice that stung me. "I don't think you have the slightest conception or appreciation of the value of these things.
But, fortunately, they don't belong to you. And I beg to inform you that I shall sort them right here in this room. So if you intend to remove the couches and rugs you'd better be quick about it."
"Grammarly for your exquisite courtesy," I retorted, and felt very much as would a small girl who had just stuck out her tongue at some rude boy. "If you will kindly leave the room for 15 minutes I will get Katie and Jim and clear the furnisings out."
"Vot Dis All Mean?"
The words he growled in response were unintelligible to me, as he muttered them on his way upstairs to the attic. As soon as he had disappeared I hastily summoned Jim and Katie, and for the next quarter of an hour we worked like Trojans.
"Vot all dis mean?" Katie demanded with the freedom born of her long, faithful service to me. "You say we not move for four days yet.
Vot use tearin' dis all oop so soon?"
It gets us nodding, and it look like "der devil."
"Mr. Graham wishes to sort his papers down here because it is so cold in the attic, and if we don't take the furniture and rugs out they will rot all dusty," I explained carefully, yet all I felt much more like dismissing the girl with a curt reprimand for her impertinence, unconscious though I knew it to be. Sometimes the necessity I am under to treat Katie's foibles with forbearance because I knew of what was before her, grates upon my nerves.
I saw Jim flash a disapproving look at her, which Katie heeded not at all. Neither marriage nor time has changed my irresponsible, tempestuous, little maid. She made a magnificent little move at my explanation.
"Dot Meester Graham he ought to have hees head examined," she said rebelliously.
(To be continued)
