Proper Reading and Speaking Advocated in Training of Children

Prof. Edmund S. Conklin, head of the department of psychology of the University of Oregon, held the undivided attention of an audience of women in the auditorium of the Commercial club yesterday afternoon when he spoke upon the influences of the family upon the attitude of the child. His assertions, of course, were based upon long study and endthe University of Oregon, held the were based upon long study and endless research

He said that the old theory of looking at beautiful pictures, statuary, reading pleasing literature and listening to good music was all very well, and commendable at any time, but that these things did not "mark" the unborn child.

Evolution Touched On.

He spoke briefly upon evolution. Pre-natal Influence Theory is explaining that racial characteristics of innate love of the open fire, and the peculiar response to the moon, were but the outcome of generations of life in the open.

"There is no nervous connection between the parent and the child,' he declared. "Poison in the circulatory system produces defective children - feeble-minded parents
