The Story of a Honeymoon

A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by ADELE GARRISON

CHAPTER 554

WHY LILLIAN INSISTS THAT MADGE REMAIN A FEW DAYS WITH HER.

Katherine Sonnot and I stared in wide-eyed amazement at Lillian Underwood when she declared that if her surprise was correct as to the source of the money which enabled Grace Draper to come back to this country, the girl was as dangerous in New York as a Bengal tiger would be.

For there was something in our friend's voice that awed us, which gave me at least an impression of something big, altogether beyond us, the key to knowledge of which Lillian held.

Fortunately Katherine and I generally know when to keep silent, and we closed our lips upon our astonishment, waiting until Lillian should choose to explain her words.

She sat down again in a low chair facing the fire after she had made her dramatic declaration, cupped her chin in her hands in the fashion so familiar to me, and stared at the fire. It was the attitude she always assumed when there was a problem to be solved.

It was fully five minutes before she spoke again. When she did, her words came slowly, as if she were weighing each one before she uttered it.

"Girls," she said, "there are some

Statue To Cement A Trans-Atlantic Friendship

FRANCE'S GIFT TO AMERICA WEE CONTRIBUTOR TO "AMERICA'S GIFT TO FRANCE"

"AMERICA'S GIFT TO FRANCE" Frederick MacMonnies at Work on Preliminary Model of Statue to be Erected on the Marne—Above: Night Photograph of Liberty Enlightening the World, Given to the United States by the People of France Thirty-Five Years Ago—In Circle is Official Collector's Button.

The wealthiest financiers of the country will step aside for the young philanthropists of the kindergarten and public schools in America, when, during the days from March 22 to March 27, the youngsters of the nation will provide the greater part of a fund for one of the world's colossal masterpieces.

The coppers and nickels and dimes of the urchins in the slums, of the lads on the corner ball lot and of the boys and girls in every sort of school are going to form the foundation for "America's Gift to France," a statue to be carved by Frederick MacMonnies, presented to France in commemoration of the first Battle of the Marne, and raised on a site selected by Foch and Joffre on the famous French river.

Contributions for "America's Gift to France" will be collected in this country just as sous and centimes and francs were gathered in France thirty-five years ago to pay for the great bronze goddess which now presides over the waters of the Atlantic seaboard—The Statue of Liberty Enlightening the World, in New York harbor. It was the work of Frederic A. Bartholdi, an Alsatian sculptor, who gave his heart and hand to the work, dying a poor artist in Paris. It was paid for by men, women and children of the French republic.

"America's Gift to France" will be a sister to the Statue of Liberty. It will be the return act of an international courtesy between republican governments. Representing every side and sentiment of American life, the statue for the Marne will be paid for by coins rolling down from the crests of the Rockies, from the summits of the Blue Ridge and from the peaks of the Adirondacks. Children, who will outlive adults,

This little Miss America toddled far to the United States Sub-Treasury in New York to exchange a rickel for five bright pennies to contribute to "America's Gift to France." Her enthusiasm won her a visit to the coin room of Uncle Sam's strong-box, where she is shown surrounded by approximately $250,000 worth of coin, the estimated cost of the Marne statue—Thousands of American school children are contributing their mites toward the erection of this colossal memorial.

are most interested in the perpetuation of this comradeship between two countries.

Contributions in cash or checks are being received by Charles H. Sablin, treasurer, "America's Gift to France," 150 Nassau street, New York City.

Frederick MacMonnies, the sculptor who is at work on the model for the statue, is giving his services free. It is estimated that $250,000 will be needed for the erection and transportation of the statue.

Governors of most of the states are serving as chairmen of state committees, supervising the work of the county and local committees throughout the country. Every community will be given an opportunity to contribute to this sister of the Statue of Liberty, which is destined to outlast the Sphinx and the pyramids, and mark for all time one of the world's sacred spots.

things I can tell you about this business and some things I cannot. I want you to trust me, and to feel that whatever evasions I make are not made because I don't trust you fully, but because I am in honor bound not to disclose anything more than I tell you. And I must ask your promise not to reveal even the things I tell you which seem most trivial, and the prohibition includes your husband, Madge, and your fiancée, Katherine.

"I Am A Nurse."

She smiled and I gave her a loving smile in return.

"You have my promise," I said earnestly.

But Katherine drew herself up proudly.

"I am a nurse," she said, and it was as if she had said, "I am a clergyman." I knew the high pride in her profession that was hers. She evidently felt that she needed to give no further pledge of keeping inviolate a confidence.

Lillian's rare tact saved a situation that threatened to become strained.

"I need no other pledge, my dear," she said quietly, and the tenseness of Katherine's face relaxed.

"There have been secret forces at work against our country for a long time," Lillian said slowly, "forces whose ramifications extend all over the world, forces that have become a hundred, yes, a thousand times more dangerous in these few days since America entered the war. Of course, you, as everyone else know this in a general way, but I happen to have a little special knowledge of it."

"Why Mince Words?"

"One of the most dangerous nests in the country where your father is, Madge, and the country from which I am sure Grace Draper has just come. And if she, penniless, as I know her to have been, has been able to make such a journey, I am almost sure that those in charge of that particular section of rail offered her sufficient money to make it worth her while to enter their employ."

"You don't mean she has become a spy in the employ of her country's enemies, Lillian?" I gasped, unable to comprehend how any American-born woman, unscrupulous though I knew Grace Draper to be, could possibly sink so low.

Katherine's face, thinned by her untiring labors for the American hospital unit in France, of which she was a part, reflected my horror.

"I mean just that," retorted Lillian. "Why mince words? But, of course, we'll have our work cut out for us to prove it. We don't even know for certain that she is in New York, although I'd be willing to wager everything I have or ever hope to possess that she is. And she is only a tiny part of an organization so vast that to pluck her out of it prematurely while not vital to that organization might disturb important plans of the people who are doing their best to trace the filaments of this gigantic spider's web. We shall have to proceed very carefully. I wouldn't bother especially with her, only I am afraid from these clippings, Madge, that she means harm to your father, and means you to guess it."

"To my father?" I repeated, my lips stiff with terror.

"It may be mistaken," Lillian returned quickly with a glance at me. "We can tell better when the next clippings come, as they surely will. It was a very clever thought to have your personal mail forwarded to Katherine. We shall be free from all
