REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

The Story of a Honeymoon

A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by ADELE GARRISON

CHAPTER 596

HOW THE ANONYMOUS LETTERS DISCLOSED THEIR SINISTER PURPOSE.

I raised a tortured face to Lillian's as I read the last of the anonymous clippings addressed to me, and which she and Katherine had kept for me until I had the opportunity to come into the city to get them myself.

"Of course she means my father," I said, and the sound of my own voice startled me, so hoarse and unfamiliar it was.

"I am afraid so," Lillian said gently. There was no need for either her or me to identify the pronoun I had used. "She" to Lillian meant me, and to Katherine Sonnot also, meant but one person, beautiful, malignant Grace Draper.

"Let me see the last two envelopes, the ones that Katherine just brought," I asked.

Katherine looked at Lillian, who gave a silent sign of acquiescence, and my little friend extended the two envelopes she had brought from her lodgings.

I opened the one of the earlier date first. There was no newspaper story in it, but something far more disquieting, the announcement of an undertaking firm advertising cheap funerals, in the center of which was the photographic reproduction of a coffin.

"You Must Be Brave."

With a little shudder I passed both it and the unopened envelope over to Lillian.

"You open the other one," I said faintly. "I haven't the courage."

She tore it open, and I saw by the look she bent upon me that fears of her own had been confirmed.

"Oh what is it?" I gasped.

"You must be brave, Madge," Lillian said, and there was an undefinable something in her voice that made me realize it was not thus she was wont to take the blows of fate. "Remember this whole series of letters is designed solely to frighten you. There is a possibility that there may be little foundation for them. But in any event you must nerve yourself to meet whatever is in store for you."

I stretched out my hand for the letter in reply. I could not utter a word, my throat was too constricted for speech. But I compelled my hand to steadiness, for I made myself remember that I was Lillian's trusted aid in her work. She could have no use for anything except of steady nerves and stout hearts.

The thing that met my eyes, however, was enough to unnerve any daughter's heart. A broad black border line like the frame of a picture, drawn with pen and ink, surrounded words, the letters of which had been cut from a newspaper and pasted on the sheet of cheap notepaper. There were two lines of these words, the upper in capital letters of large type, read:

"THE LATE ROBERT GORDON, ALIAS CHARLES SPENCER

The lower, in smaller type, and lower case letters, was still more terrifying, for it bore the sinister legend:

"Better Not To Guess How He Died"

And down in the lower right hand corner of the sheet of paper, in the smallest type of all, were these words:

"An Revolt for Two Weeks."

I sat gazing at the thing before me, my hands clutching the table for support. I was determined that I would not betray any weakness before Lillian, so I kept my head down as if studying the hideous captions upon the paper, a pretense almost subconscious on my part. For I didn't even see the words, that is, with my physical eyes, although they were burned into my brain as if with a branding iron, ready to come back to me at any moment when I should dare think of them. The immediate effect of the hideous threats, however, was to numb and blind me, while my brain, as I have heard that of a drowning person does, flashed backward over the tragic years of my father's life.

Until after my little mother's death and my own marriage I had never seen the father whose probability of broadway, as I was dubbed for his eternal searching of faces, and never more so than when, after he had found me, he returned to South America, where he had spent so many years. I knew that Allen Drake, who, Lillian said, was a member of the secret service, although in a capacity unknown to her, was searching for him. That the two men were at cross-purposes I suspected from the fact that Drake's attitude appeared to be hostile. Yet even now, secreted in the wrist watch upon my arm, was a note dubbed by my father's message one of the highest importance, to be delivered to Drake in case of my father's death or upon receipt of a code cablegram from him.

But his work, his sins, everything else was dwarfed for me by the realization of his fate as imagined by

DALLAS CLUB COMES TODAY

Whole Population of Neighboring City Will See Game With Senators

Oxford field will be the scene of another battle this afternoon at 2:30 when the Salem Senators meet the Dallas baseball club. A hard contest is looked forward to, as Dallas is importing some star players especially for today's game, and claims that the Senators will have to play big league ball in order to keep the bacon at home.

Manager Biddy Bishop says his boys are in first-class shape and that Oxford field has been gone over so that some fast playing should result. The locals showed that they were a much improved bunch of tossers in their game last Sunday, and they will have the same line-up today, with the exception that Jack Hayes will be catching. Cole will be on the slab, and if he shows as much stuff as he did last Sunday, the Dallas bunch will be lucky if they see the old apple.

It is expected that the whole population of Dallas will accompany their team as the town is baseball wild and willing to back their team to the limit. There should be a big delegation of Salem fans on deck this afternoon as the Senators are going great guns, and Oxford park is expected to accommodate the biggest crowd so far this season.

Dallas has not announced its line-up as yet. The Senators will line-up as follows: Bishop, first; Proctor, second; Miller, short; Nelson, third; Kracke, left field; Stepp, center; Holmes, right; Cole, pitcher; Hayes, catcher.
