News That World is Short of Dyes Idle Gossip to This Mountain Matron

With Woods Full of Plants, and an Iron Pot in Dooryard, She Goes on Making Own Garments Just as Her Forebears Have for Generations—Churches to Help Communities in Out-of-Way America.

SOME one forgot to tell the lady of the North Carolina mountains, shown in the photograph, that there was a scarcity of dyes because of the war and that she really ought not to dye the strands of wool she holds in her hand until she can get chemicals from abroad.

One of the interesting facts brought to light by the great survey of the interchurch World Movement is that these mountain folk never cared for nor needed foreign dyes. They have been shearing their own sheep, spinning their own wool and dyeing the strands in the colors they prefer, for centuries making their own dyes from plants that grow in their own fields.

The open iron boiler is set on stones and a wood fire is built to heat the dye water to the proper temperature. Then the strands are dipped for the requisite length of time, dried, and finally made ready to be fashioned into hose, muffler or nightcap.

The lady shown in the photograph is typical of the hills in which she lives. She wears the wide sunbonnet which is the customary headgear of women of the countryside every day except Sunday, and for many of them, on Sunday too. She is also typical of the lack of modern facilities for education and recreation and the prevalence of poverty which keep these hill folk harnessed to a bare and uninteresting existence.

Out of the survey which the Inter-Church World

Movement has made in these out-of-the-way sections of the United States has come a program for the aid—mental, moral and physical—of such communities. This program is backed by the evangelical group of America's Protestant churches. The march of progress is about to lead over the hills of North Carolina, and their people are to fall in line.

Foresees Telephone Across the Ocean

Major-Gen. George O. Squier, Major-General Squier, already notable for his work in the U. S. Signal Service, predicts ocean telephony by means of a bare wire on the ocean's bed along and outside of which wireless impulses may be sent. The principle has already been demonstrated over land.

Sixty Thousand Dollars Remains for Dependents

The soldiers', sailors' and marines' commission, created by the legislation of 1919 by an act which appropriated $100,000 for the commission's use has the sum of $60,000 unexpended which it has a right to use for the relief of dependents of service men. F. W. Mulkey, chairman of the commission, inquired of Attorney General Brown whether the money could be used for the dependents of the service men, and the attorney general's reply is that the commission, under the act, has the privilege of exercising its own discretion in that regard. The commission was created to insure the welfare of men returning from overseas pending their procuring employment or otherwise becoming self-supporting. A part of the money was used in New York City where Oregon citizens established club rooms for Oregon men under the charge of a specially appointed committee.

Johann Van Albert is afraid he will never grow up. He is only nineteen years old and now stands only eight feet five inches. One of those intrepid photographers who board incoming steamships at New York asked Johann if he would have his picture taken. The photographer, who measures five feet eight inches, got results, as shown above. Johann does not conceal the fact that he came over to join a circus.
