CHAPTER 605.

HOW MADGE WON LILLIAN'S ENTHUSIASTIC LIPPLIAN.

"You shouldn't do that, Madge," Lillian Underwood shook her head at me with laughing disapproval.

"Do what?" I asked bewildered.

"Begin to say something and then cut it short. Much better get it out of your system. Tell me how you're going to manage to meet Harry."

I looked at her with the amazement I always feel at her almost psychic reading of the thoughts of those around her. A scheme for accomplishing our purpose had come into my mind, but I had stifled the impulse to tell Lillian of it, fearing she might think me presumptuous.

"I mean it," Lillian persisted, and I fancied there was a note of irritation in her voice at my delay. "If you have any idea how we're going to work it I want to hear it."

"Why, the thought came to me," I began diffidently, "that as Mr. Underwood used to be so interested in theatrical collections—"

"You wonder child!" Lillian exclaimed, jumping up from her chair. "Of course! The very thing! You mean he will be sure to haunt that room in the public library where they are showing that wonderful collection of programs and manuscripts, plays and portraits of the theatrical world?"

I nodded, for I had no words with which to answer her. Her brain works so fast sometimes that it dazes me. It had needed but the one word from me to enable her to grasp the complete scheme.

In another moment she was working out the details.

"Act Naturally."

"Lucky that Harry knows you're a history shark," she said, referring to the subject I had taught for years. "He will imagine you're looking up something for an abstruse history of the early amusements in our western civilization." Her tone held laughing mockery, but I caught the bitter undertone, knew that this task she was facing was a heart-breaking one to her.

"You'd better get there early in the morning the day you go, and be very busy engaged with the more scholarly part of the collection—Harry thinks you're an awful high brow, you know. Have a notebook, of course, and don't send even a glance in his direction until he discovers you."

"And then what?" I asked anxiously, for this was the question tormenting me. How was I to greet Harry Underwood unconcernedly with my fear of the man's sinister personality and my consciousness of the revelation Lillian had made to me of his feeling for me?

"Act exactly the way you feel at first," Lillian replied promptly, and I saw that her zeal for the cause she was serving had enabled her to hrow off the yoke of personal feeling that had hampered her in formulating plans concerning her recent husband. She was absorbed in the problem before her and was dealing with it as if a total stranger was concerned.

"You detest Harry, and are afraid of him," Lillian went on in the same curiously impersonal tone. "Therefore, you will naturally register aversion and timidity. Then he will begin to talk to you, and after a bit, in spite of yourself, you will experience the old, uncomfortable, fascinating interest which he always aroused in you. Instead of fighting even a semblance of interest in what he is saying, as you always used to do, compel yourself to a little tolerance. Make him feel that he has been able to lessen your aversion to him by ever so little."

"Your Head Rules."

I am afraid the hackneyed expression, "stared at her open-mouthed," is the only one which would fully express my attitude as her words fell upon my ears. She had voiced what I hadn't admitted even to my most secret self, that Harry Underwood had the uncanny fascination for me that I imagine a snake has for a bird. I did indeed detest and fear him, but, on the other hand, never in my life had I met a man with the peculiar fascinating charm he has when he chooses to exercise it.

That Lillian knew of this attitude of mine was a most astounding thing to me, although I should have guessed it from my experience of her almost clairvoyant intuition. But I couldn't restrain the hot, burning blush that suffused my cheeks.

"There's no need for you to blush, Madge," Lillian said in a kindly matter-of-fact tone that helped me to regain my poise. "Harry is one of the most fascinating devils going when he wants to be. Most women simply let him manage them instead of being clear-headed enough to manage him. Your head always or nearly always rules your impulses, my dear."

"It's this quality on which I'm counting in the duel of wits for which I shall help to set the stage (To be continued)"
