Jefferson Man Succeeds Hawley on Commission

John P. Steiwer, prominent farmer of Jefferson, was yesterday appointed by Governor Olcott to succeed C. L. Hawley of McCoy as a member of the group of five men representing the state at large in investigation of proposed changes in the workmen's compensation act. This group and two others compose a committee of 45, representing the employers and the employees of the state and the state at large, and will report at the next session of the legislature. Mr. Hawley resigned from the committee because of his recent nomination for the office of state food and dairy commissioner.

HOW WILLIAM OUTWITTED HIS COUSIN AGATHA'S CURIOSITY

I made a quick, protesting step forward as Cousin Agatha began to undo the bandages I had put around William Trumbull's head. I knew if she once got a glimpse of the straight cuts—evidently from a knife—on the poor old chap's cranium, she would know that my story of tree limbs grazing his head was untrue, and that she would never rest until she had ferreted out the truth concerning his wounds. But I wouldn't have been in time to prevent her from getting at least one bandage off if William himself had not thwarted her intention. With an agility surprising in a man of his dwarfed stature and clumsy-looking limbs he put up his hand to the bandage she was fingering, literally snatching it from her grasp, leaped from his cot bed, rushed across the room, and stood literally at bay in the corner. "If it's just the same to ye, ma'am," he said apologetically, "I don't want nobody to monkey with them bandages. Miss Gramie she put 'em on just as good as a doctor could and they feels awful comfortable now. I don't want 'em tetched. I'll be all right now—don't need no more doctorin'. I've been hurt much worse than this. Wunst when I was a boy, I hed my head split pretty near open, an' 'Maw she didn't have nothin' but cobwebs to stop the bleedin', an' I come out jest fine."

A Barbed Shaft.

I saw Cousin Agatha give a fastidious shiver at the tale of the cobweb treatment. Then she eyed William malevolently.

"How very touching," she said, turning to me. "You really ought to appreciate such devotion, Margaret."

Cousin Agatha has one virtue. She knows when she has been outwitted. She realized that she could gain no information from William or me, and I knew by the lowering expression on Katie's face that the only answer Cousin Agatha would get from any questions she might put to Katie would be my little maid's stereotyped reply when in a sullen mood: "I know nothings, nothings."

What Katie Said.

"Yes, I must be hurrying back," she replied meekly, then sent a return shaft of her own as she descended the stairs. "I'm afraid poor Cousin Harriett would get very indignant care, call many times without answering if she didn't have her poor, old faithful kinswoman with her."

Katie shook an irrefragable fist after her retreating back. I pretended not to see her, but I couldn't ignore her whispered comment: "Dot old devil, I wish she fall over herself vunce. I like to beat her oop goot."

"Katie," I said sternly, "if I ever hear language like that from you again I shall—"

"Discharge you were the words upon my lips; then I remembered the voluntary promise I had made to Jim, Katie's husband when he enlisted.

"I will take care of Katie and the little one that is coming, and keep them safe for you when you return," I had said. I could make no threat of discharge to Katie. But I had to reprove her ebullition in some way.

"Punish you," I finished lamely.

Katie looked wide-eyed and trembled at me for a moment. Then she giggled one of her irrefragable chuckles.

"Vot you do? You take steeck to me, or put me to bed nothings to eat?" she asked, then suddenly sobered at the sight of my face.

"Plees, dear Missis Graham, no be mad by me. I bad girl, talk dat vay, but ven dot old cousin-vomans say dose mean tings to you I could keel."

She raised her arms above her head in a sudden passionate gesture, then lowered them, and quickly turning, hurried down the steps and out of the barn. I watched her, troubled for a minute. How was I ever to guide Katie's turbulent, undisciplined nature? I always had the same uneasy feeling concerning her that I would have had were a package of high explosive near me.

I turned to William, who was still standing in the corner where he had gone to escape Cousin Agatha's ministrations. In one hand he still held the end of the bandage she had started to undo. His sudden movement, together with her loosening of the bandage, had started the blood to flowing again in that particular cut. I saw that that part of my work would have to be done over again.

When I had finished the rebandaging, and William was once more resting upon his cot, something upon which I insisted, although he protested his complete recovery, I waited with nervous, constricted throat for his revelations concerning Grace Draper.

Governor Submits Names of Hammond, Moshberger and Miller to Washington

Governor Olcott is requested in a letter from Newton D. Baker, secretary of war, to telegraph at once to the adjutant general at Washington the names of national guard officers recommended by the guard officers' membership on military committees under a law approved June 4, this year. The governor is asked to inform the adjutant general if he has no recommendations to make, and if he has recommendations to submit at least three names and not to exceed six.

The governor has recommended Col. Creed C. Hammond of Portland, Major Eugene Moshberger of Woodburn and Major O. Miller of McMinnville, all overseas men. Hammond commanded a regiment, Moshberger a battalion and Miller a company. The act referred to provides that "Subject to revision and approval by the secretary of war, the plans and regulations under which the initial organization and territorial distribution of the national guard and the organized reserves shall be made, shall be prepared by a committee of the branch or division of the war department general staff, which is charged with the preparation of plans for the national defense and the mobilization of the land forces of the United States." In addition to general staff members there shall be an equal number of reserve officers, including reserve officers who hold or have held commissions in the national guard.
