The Story of a Honeymoon

A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by ADELE GARRISON

CHAPTER 622.

WHY LILLIAN SAID "YOU MUST GO TO THE LIBRARY TOMORROW MORNING."

"This is simply wonderful luck. Madge, wonderful!" Lillian was radiant as I finished telling her of William's adventures with the pseudo-peddler whose address he had overheard by chance. "This will mean eventually the rounding up of all of them, and most particularly Grace Draper," she went on. "I didn't have any real proof that she was mixed up in the business before, but the fact that she was issuing orders to the man who tried to get in this room—who would have succeeded if it hadn't been for your cleverness"—she patted my hand affectionately—"clinches her connection with that nest of spies. Just let me check up on that address again." She held her pencil poised above her notebook. "I consulted mine again. "Sixty-seven Prince street," I read. "Ask for Adams." "Adams," Lillian repeated as if trying to fix it in her memory. "That's probably one of a dozen names he has. Well, Mr. Adams, we'll put those on your trail tonight who will follow you for a year if necessary and never lose sight of you. They will put you to bed at night, get you up in the morning, dine with you, even dance with you if you care for such diversion."

In my ignorance I had hoped that the desperate man over whose hand I had thrown carbolic acid when he was attempting to enter Lillian's library, the man who, according to William's version, had promised a brutal revenge upon me, would be at once wanted and apprehended by the service in which Lillian stood high. Lillian looked at me searchingly. "You'd breathe easier if there were some good thick jail bars between you and him, wouldn't you, my dear?" she asked kindly. "Yes, I should," I admitted, shamefacedly. "I wish it could be managed for your sake," she said regretfully, then soberly she added, "but it is necessary in these cases to let some of the men whose identity we discover have all the rope they need." By following their trail unsuspected by them they lead us to the more dangerous spies, the brains of the conspiracies. In this particular case, letting him go his way now will result in landing Grace Draper, and—the conversation the man resented Miss Draper's air of authority, and told her that if she didn't speak civilly he would 'inform Herr Underwood of this little expedition.' The threat evidently cowed the woman, for she changed her manner toward me man at once. A gleam of satisfaction flashed across Lillian's troubled face, to vanish again almost as quickly. "That proves he is mixed up in the treachery, but also what I have always contended," she said, "that Harry will be no party to anything that will harm you. His feeling for you is, I believe, the most sincere emotion he has ever experienced." She paused, looked steadily at me for a long moment, then laid her hand over mine. "It is that on which I'm counting to save him," she said, "and there is no time to be lost. You must go to the library tomorrow morning." (To be continued)

A little spasm of pain crossed her face, and she left the sentence unfinished. I averted my eyes from her face in pitying embarrassment, for I know of what she was thinking. If Grace Draper were landed in the net spread by the secret service, Harry Underwood would in all probability also be emmeshed. It wasn't a particularly pleasant thing for Lillian to face, this prospect of being instrumental in handing over the man who had been her husband to the rigors of the law. There was one grain of comfort, however, I could give her, one which I had omitted in my story of William's encounter with the pseudo peddler on account of my reluctance ever to mention Harry Underwood's name. Moreover, it had seemed of minor importance to me.

Wood Ballot Rolls

The chairman of the New Hampshire delegation announced three votes for Wood. He was drowned out by demands to know whether the candidate was General Wood. A lot of good-natured raillery followed and then it was explained that the votes were for Chandler M. Wood of Boston, president of the Metropolitan Trust company. As the roll call went on there were few states outside of those having favorite sons that did not scatter their total among several candidates. Texas was an exception, giving her solid delegation of 40 to McAdoo.

showing on the first ballot would be between McAdoo and Palmer unless there was an upset further down the roll of the states. Many of the states were distributing their strength as a compliment to various candidates, however, and seemed almost certain that there would be no nomination on that ballot. There were some hisses when Massachusetts cast one of her 36 for William R. Hearst, and there was a roar of applause a moment later when 17 from that state went to Palmer. Another flash of handicapping followed announcement of the first vote for W. J. Bryan. It came from Michigan.
