CHAPTER 634.

WHAT HAPPENED WHEN MADGE MET HARRY UNDERWOOD IN THE LIBRARY.

I don't know whether to call it telepathy or something else, but although my eyes were averted from Harry Underwood's direction, and assiduously studying the printed page before me, I knew the moment he first caught sight of me as well as if I had been gazing directly at

It was as if a tiny electric beil had sounded somewhere within my consciousness, warning me that at last the moment I had so dreaded was at hand.

By a tremendous effort I kept my face devoid of expression, my eyes fixed upon the pamphlet before me. although I heard the firm tread of masculine feet coming toward me. steps which I identified as those of the man whom I so feared. Harry Underwood's step was a distinctive one, and one not easily forgotten by any one who had heard it more than once or twice.

Then his hateful, well-remembered voice spoke softly from across the

"If I can determine the particular god or devil that looks after me I'm sure going to offer him a libation this afternoon. Talk about luck! To think of finding you here, lady fair!" I had schooled myself for hours for this meeting, resolved to play my part as Lillian and I had outlined it days before. Surprise and aver-31½ acre tract, 5½ miles from Salem, 25 acres cultivated, balance pasture and timber, house and barn, well, rock road. Price $5000.

across the desk, his brilliant black eyes agleam with the old expression ed. "You're surely not going to begin again that eyes-and-hands-offme-villyun stuff you always used to carry around with you. Don't you think I deserve just one kind glance for not giving you and Lil and your other friend away the other night?" My thoughts leaped back to Lillian's expedition to the Latin-American cafe, to Grace Draper's unsuspecting eyes, and to Harry Underwood's attitude toward us. I was glad, indeed, that he had referred to the incident, for it gave me the pretext I neded to carry out Lillian's instructions gradually to modify my harsh attitude toward Mr. Underwood in order to gain his confidence.

"I've Got to See You." "You were kind that night," I admitted slowly. "I suppose I ought to thank you."

He muttered something beneath his breath, and then spoke tensely.

though in so low a voice that no one but myself could hear him. "See here, girl, if I have offended you, and I suppose I have in about nine hundred million different ways since I first met you, I'm mighty sorry. And I promise you I'll be old Messrs. Discretion and Repression themselves when I'm talking with you. But I've just got to see you in some place where we can talk without the chance of somebody we know coming in. There's a lady liable to pop back here any minute that I wouldn't have see you for a good deal, and that's not on her account either."

What Does He Know? Idrew myself up haughtily at his impertinent proposal and was just about to turn away and hurry out of the library when the memory of Lillian's admonition came back to me. I was at a loss how to handle bizarre situation. His next words startled me out of any thought of self. "Now, don't get it into that pretty obstinate dome of yours that I want to make love to you. I do, you know that, but, on honor, I'll be good. But let me talk to you somewhere else than here. More depends on it than you can guess. I've been trying to get a chance to see you ever since I came back. I tell you, life and death may hang on your consent or refusal." His words, following those I had heard Grace Draper speak at the entrance to the room, set my brain to wild speculation. Did this man hold the secret of my father's fate? (To be continued.)

Lady-I suppose you have had some hair-breadth escapes during your seafaring life Sailor-Yes'm. I was nearly drowned once when I went to sleep in the bathtub and forgot to turn off the water.
