

REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

The Story of a Honeymoon

A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by ADELE GARRISON.

CHAPTER 652

HOW MADGE SET FORTH UPON HER ADVENTURE

"Allen Drake is to be at the Pennsylvania station at 7:45 o'clock," Lillian began, and I straightened at her words as I like to imagine a soldier might at receiving orders. I knew that every part of mentality I possessed must be "on the job," as Dicky would say, from this minute on. "He will be standing near the entrance of the woman's waiting room, which is nearest the stairs leading down from the waiting room to the dressing rooms below. You are sure you know the one I mean?" "Yes," I returned laconically. "You will take a taxi from here to the Long Island entrance of the station. Then you will cross over and enter the downstairs dressing rooms through the door from the lower floor corridor outside. You have come in that way, haven't you from the Long Island trains?" "Often."

"Good!" Lillian flashed me a glance which spelled approval of my concise replies. "Then you will come up the stairs into the women's waiting room and out through the door of which I told you. You will have your traveling bag in hand, so that in an emergency you can pretend either to be just coming in from Long Island or going there. If all goes well, Mr. Drake will meet you casually as if he were surprised to see you there. From that minute you will do exactly as he says. Only, if the unexpected should happen, and someone should be talking to him, or should come up to you, watch him and what he says very carefully. He will be compelled to give you your cues in the guise of the most commonplace sentences, and you must be alert to understand them. For any other emergencies you must trust to your own resourcefulness."

What Katherine Suggested. "But I anticipate the smoothest sort of sailing for you. I don't believe anyone suspects your connection with the service except Grace Draper and that man whose hand you scarred so effectively with carbolic acid. Harry is taking care of Grace, and the other man is in Philadelphia tonight—I had a report on him a few minutes ago, so you're comparatively safe from molestation." "If I may make a suggestion?" Katherine put in apologetically. "A dozen," Lillian returned, with an affectionate approving smile. "Wouldn't it be a good plan for Madge to take a small knitting bag as well as her traveling bag, and have ready for use concealed within it that little ammonia gun of mine?" "Splendid!" Lillian returned. "Of course, I didn't want her to carry a revolver or anything of that kind, but a silent little ammonia gun is a different thing. I'm sure you'll have no occasion for it, Madge." She turned to me reassuringly, "but it won't do any harm for you to have it with you."

"You must teach me how to use it, Katherine," I said, trying to keep a feeling of helplessness, in the face of all these preparations, from settling around my heart. "That won't take a minute," she returned, and from her own knitting bag brought the small object which I had such grateful reason to remember. Katherine had saved me from terrible disfigurement with that little ammonia gun. Indeed, I wasn't sure that my life itself hadn't been in danger when she had discharged it into the maddened face of Mrs. Allyn. I could not repress a little shiver as I saw it, but at the look of disappointment which flashed into Lillian's face, and which I think she meant me to see, I braced my trembling nerves and resolutely reached out my hand to Katherine for it.

"I'll Not Fail You." "It's rather simple, isn't it?" I said with an unbecoming air as I could manage and was rewarded by the approval in Lillian's eyes. "Absurdly so," Katherine returned, and then for the next two or three minutes she carefully instructed me in its use, and made me practice in its discharge until she was sure that I would make no mistake if I needed to use it.

"There," she said, thrusting it back into her knitting bag and handing it to me with a little bow, "you're fully armed for any emergency, my dear. I thought you'd better take my knitting bag as it's smaller. I took the liberty of putting the scarf you are doing into it, so you can camouflage any enforced idleness you may happen to encounter."

"You're a brick, Katherine," Lillian said approvingly, and my little friend flushed with pleasure. The doorbell pealed a summons, and Lillian sprang to her feet. "There's the taxi now," she said. "Get into your things quickly and remember not to be nervous. You'll get through all right. Are you sure you remember just how and where you're to meet Drake?" "Absolutely sure," I returned. "and—I'll not fail you, Lillian." "I know you won't, my dear," she returned as she kissed me. (To be continued)

PLAN HIT UPON BY UNIVERSITY

Scheme Presented Whereby New Buildings May Go Up Immediately

Because money of the state is not now available for the construction of buildings that are urgently needed at the University of Oregon, a plan has been hit upon whereby a music building and a men's dormitory may be built by a holding company with money raised by bonds sold to alumni of the university, the buildings to be rented to the institution and become state university property after the bonds are retired. They would be located on ground adjacent to the university ground, but not owned by the state at present. Whether this plan of procedure would be legal is a question, and President Campbell has placed it before Attorney General Brown for an opinion. Mr. Brown regards the question as highly important and has not yet passed on it.

Plan Is Outlined. President Campbell outlines the plan as follows in his letter to the attorney general: "The buildings would be placed on grounds adjacent to the university campus but not the property of the university. They would be constructed by a business corporation organized as a holding company specifically for this purpose. This company would purchase the necessary land and construct the buildings (using plans approved by the university) with funds raised by selling bonds to alumni and other citizens of the state."

"This holding company would, before commencing construction, make a contract with the university under the terms of which the latter would pay rental for the use of each of the buildings sufficient to pay in five years (or any other specified time) both the cost of the buildings and the interest on the bonds. With this rental the holding company would the interest on the bonds and retire them when due. The holding company would agree in the contract to deed the university the whole property, buildings and land, when all the bonds were paid. College Given Full Use.

"The rental rate will necessarily be above the customary percentage of original cost paid as building rent, because of the fact that these payments will amortize in a few years the total cost of the property, including the interest on the bonds. This fact would be fully explained and set forth in the contract. "The buildings would be operated by the university, the company having nothing to do with them after their completion except to receive its periodic rental from the university for the term specified, and at the end of this to deed the property to the university. In other words, the university is said to have the unlimited use of the buildings from their completion, and is to become owner of them at the termination of the contract."

Want To Keep Your Hair Perpetually Curly?

Perpetually wavy or curly hair is now within the means of every woman to possess. One need only get a few ounces of plain liquid silmerine from the druggist and apply a little of it occasionally with a clean tooth brush before doing up the hair. When this does the most beautiful and natural looking waves and creases imaginable are in evidence. Wind and heat do not affect the curls as where a heated iron has been used. Liquid silmerine is so pure and harmless there is not the slightest danger of spotting the scalp or streaking the hair and it leaves no sticky or greasy trace. It will also be appreciated as a beneficial dressing, as it keeps the hair soft, silky and lustrous.

BIG MONEY IN BOOTLEGGING

Canada Officials Say That 200 Dollar Fine Is Not Large Enough

OTTAWA, July 26.—As long as profits from bootlegging are what they are, and the only deterrent is a fine of $200 or so there will be big money in the bootlegging game and it will be very difficult for the authorities on either side of the international line to stamp out the traffic. That is the summary of opinions expressed by Ottawa officials as to the situation regarding smuggling of liquor from Canada to the United States. Further, high officials of the Royal Canadian Mounted police say that while they are doing all in their power to check infractions of the federal laws in this respect, it is really for the American authorities to see that liquor does not reach the thirsty souls beyond the imaginary line 3,000 miles long.

The situation apparently is that from three provinces in particular there is a large trade in bootlegging to the United States. These are Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia. At the same time a respectable quantity of the fiery liquid is finding its way across from the Maritime provinces and from Manitoba. At Windsor and in surrounding districts the mounted police are carrying on a constant campaign against the illegal liquor vendors, and many have been hauled into court and condemned to pay fines from $200 up. One parched Detroit man, however, is said to have parted with $500 for three cases of Scotch whiskey, which reached him via the "underground route" a short time ago, so that the profits in the illegal trade are known to be enormous. Information from Windsor and district intimates to the authorities here that some farmers in that vicinity have found it more profitable to smuggle liquor across the border than to farm and have let their farms go to the weeds while they pursue the elusive dollar via the bootlegging route.

Quebec, it is stated, is the mecca for thirsty thousands of Americans every week-end, and automobiles passing back and forth carry their loads of human and other freight, bound for the Sahara across the border. Under these conditions, Canadian police authorities admit that it is practically impossible to enforce the stringent liquor laws at present in force.

The chief reason for difficulty of enforcement, according to an official of the Royal Canadian Mounted police, who have under their jurisdiction the carrying out of federal laws, is the fact that many people are not in sympathy with the liquor legislation, and the securing of contraband liquor is regarded in many quarters as an act of venement rather than a disgrace. However, if the carrying of liquor into the United States from Canada is to be prevented, it is intimated that it will have to be done by an army of customs inspectors and police on the American side of the line rather than in Canada.
