girl again, and upon my chubby she added angrily. arms were clasped this bracelet and its mate. It was one of the flashlight impressions which a child's mind receives-the only memories we have, oddly assorted photographs here and there.

I was only 4 years old when my father so cruelly deserted my mother, an act for which he had atoned by the suffering and loneliness of nearly a quarter of a century. I had no childish recollections of him, but I did remember wearing the quaint bracelets. And yet my mother had told me in after years that she had never put them on my arms after my father left.

They had been his gift to me upon my second birthday, and he had delighted in seeing me wear them. And when my mother gathered the threads of her broken life together she found that one of the bracelets was missing! That my father had taken it with him she was certain, and with hot, passionate anger against the man who could desert the baby girl whom he had loved so tenderly, she thrust the other bracelet into a trunk out of sight. ON HIGH STREET FROM spoke volumes to my mind of her scrutinized first one and then the "They're identical-struck from the same die," she said at last excitedly. "And look-look here!" HOTEL With fingers that trembled she SEWARI showed me where the single coin had been wrenched loose from its fastening, tearing out the orifice through which the slender chain holding the bracelet links together, had passed. "It has been part of a similar bracelet," she went on. "Now what does this mean?"

I told her of the two bracelets in as few words as possible. There was a dryness and tightness in my throat which made it impossible for me to say much. What to argue from this message I did not know, dreaded even to surmise.

Doubts That Trouble. She didn't speak for several minutes after I had finished, evidently pondering what I had said.

At last she shot a question at me abruptly: "Do you think these men who sent this coin represent your father, Margaret?" I roused at the question which put into words the doubt that was tosturing me. "How can I tell?" I demanded passionately. "Of course, the coin comes from the other bracelet, and equally, of course, he must have had it. But whether these men are under his orders, or whether they are enemies who have made away with him and are acting upon knowledge which they were able to glean before his death, I do not know."

"I do," my mother-in-law declared unexpectedly, sitting up straight in her chair, and speaking rapidly. "They belong to your enemy's camp, and would be particularly dangerous if weren't for their fool melodramatic way of doing things. I still insist that men with brains like theirs can be easily outwitted. Rest assured, my dear, that if your father wanted to safeguard you he wouldn't have to do it through pinheads like that. "No, these men, for some reason or other, want to keep you in the house here for the next week or two, and think they can accomplish their purpose either by frightening you or making you think this message came indirectly from your father. They have tried both methods in this note of Memories, poignant, sad, rushed theirs, and they're probably upon me as I took from its box chuckling now over the ease with the little bracelet of oddly en- which they've gulled you. But they'll chuckle out of the other I seemed to see myself a tiny side of their mouths before long."
