Explorer Tells of Experiences With Canibal Indians of South America

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 21-Despite the terrors through which he passed while journeying through the wilds of South America, Dr. Alexander Hamilton Rice, explorer, plans soon to leave for Egypt in an endeavor to locate a certain species of goat which is invaluable in medical research work.

He expressed this intention in an address on South America before the Geographical society

Dr. Rice said his trip through South America took him up the Rio Negro, the largest tributary of the Amazon, through a natural canal more than 200 miles in length, connecting it with the Orinoco, into hitherto unexplored portions of Brazil. It was here that he came in actual contact with Guaharibos, a virtually unknown tribe of cannibal Indians, who for 17 days pursued his party in an eifort to cut off their re-

The attack occurred in a wild spot along the banks of the Orinoco, where Dr. Rice had made camp the night before. Two of Rigdon chapel Friday afternoon his Indian guides had gone up the river in a cange to test the depth of the water, when they saw something moving along the banks. Looking closer, they perceived the forms of Indians closing in on the camp, and hastily turning about, hurried back to warn the remainder of the party. "A few moments after the guides' return," Dr. Rice said. "the entire bank was literally lined with wildly shricking and gesticulating figures who brandished bows about seven feet was accused of assaulting R. C.
