REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

The Story of a Honeymoon
A Wonderful Romance of Married Life Wonderfully Told by ADELE GARRISON
CHAPTER 791

WHAT OCCURRED AT LILLIAN'S AFTER ROBERT SAVARIN HAD SAID GOOD-BYE.

I think it was fortunate for Lillian that the next few days following her little daughter's departure were so full of duties. Otherwise I am afraid she would have dwelt far too much upon the hopelessness of her feeling for Robert Savarin and his love for her.

Save for the time when she told me the story of the horrible injustice of her child's enforced separation from her I had never seen her so moved as she was when she turned back to Katherine and me after the taxi had rolled away with Robert Savarin's face framed in the window.

Her face was white and working, her eyes fixed as if gazing at something far ahead of her. She brushed past Katherine and me without speaking, and crossed the living room to the rose-paned bedroom from which she had just sent away her little daughter.

There she paused and half-turned to us.

she said huskily, and closed the door behind her.
Katherine and I carefully avoided looking at each other. We felt that we should not comment upon our friend's emotion even by glances. Katherine was the first to speak.

"I'm going to take one more look upstairs," she said, and I shivered a bit, for I knew she meant to go into the room where old Mrs. Morton lay wrapped in her last sleep, and then I'm going to lie down. I'd advise you to try a little slumber also. There's absolutely nothing to do for awhile."

"I believe I will," I assented hastily, for I wished no thought of me to interfere with Katherine's rest. But I knew that there would be no sleep for me for hours to come.

I had been through enough in the hours which had elapsed since I started along the pipe line on my surreptitious journey to exhaust me physically and mentally. But I was keyed to so high a nervous pitch that I knew there would be no perceptible lessening of the tension for a long time.

The physical comfort of the big luxurious couch in Lillian's cool, darkened library was most welcome, however, and as I stretched myself upon it I resolved to make my mind as blank as possible and try consistently to woo the sleep I needed.

But all to no avail. The events of the hours just past, the persons who had figured in them swept through my brain in endless kaleidoscopic procession, refusing to be dismissed. I was glad, indeed, when Lillian, freshly groomed and looking as calm and unperturbed as if no emotion had touched her, came into the library.

"Been asleep, Madge?" Her keen eyes swept me, read me, and she hastily added:

"No, of course you can't sleep just yet. I'll prescribe for you."

I put out my hand protestingly.

"Please, don't try to—"

She interrupted me quickly.

Lillian, the Prescriber.

"I'm not going to put you to sleep, silly! Haven't I been through that keyed-up business? No, I'm only going to tell you how to get fit to help me this forenoon. Undress, take an ice cold shower, a brisk rubdown, and afterward get Betty to brew you a small black coffee. Then the minute this afternoon that you feel sleepy tumble into bed, and you'll know nothing more till tomorrow morning."

I followed her directions implicitly, and found her good prophet, except for the fact that it was night instead of afternoon before I felt sleepy. Lillian kept me busy all day helping her make the necessary arrangements for the laying away of the worn-out shell which had been old Mrs. Morton.

"Then You Know?"
By tacit agreement we shielded Katherine in every way possible, compelled her to keep to her bed and her room, except when we absolutely needed her. She looked so fragile and white and worn that she made me uneasy about her.

"That child's on the verge of a collapse," Lillian said anxiously, when Katherine had dragged herself into her own room late on the afternoon after performing some necessary duties in the room of death. "I'd like to twist your darling brother-cousin's neck," she added viciously.

"Then you know?" I asked, relieved that I could share knowledge of Katherine's tangled skein of love and duty.

"Of course I know. I taxed Katherine with it, and made her tell me all about it," Lillian retorted. "Jack's a hero, there's no denying that, and a fine, upstanding, clean, manly man, but he has no more tolerance or comprehension of a woman's brain or conscience than a boche!" she finished defiantly.

"Oh, I wouldn't say that!" I returned, smiling, for I knew Lillian's exaggeration when angered before.

"I mean it," she affirmed. "And I'll treat him to a few words that he'll remember to his dying day."

MAKING BAD THINGS WORSE

Winter, as if it were an evil spirit, seems to take delight in making bad things worse. Rheumatism twists harder, twinges sharper, catarrh becomes more annoying, and the many symptoms of serofula are developed and aggravated. These are common diseases, and it is a wonder that more people don't get rid of them.

Hood's Sarsaparilla has been very successful in the treatment of these complaints, it is easily obtained, and there is abundant testimony that its effects are radical and permanent.

In cases where a laxative or cathartic is needed, it is well to supplement Hood's Sarsaparilla with Hood's Pills, which are gentle, thorough and effective.

Imminent Appointment Imperative

The appointment of Dobbin is considered imperative. The telegram that Governor Olcott has received from Jay H. Dobbin of Joseph, whom he appointed several days ago as a member of the state highway commission. While Mr. Dobbin, soon after the appointment was announced, declined to accept, he has been urged to reconsider and Governor Olcott has been holding up further action in hope that Dobbin would take the post. The telegram, however, is considered decisive.

The appointment of Dobbin is universally commended in the state and the governor received numerous messages of congratulation on the selection. It is now apparent that an appointment to succeed the late E. E. Kiddle will not be made immediately.

There is to be no hurry," said Governor Olcott. "It is a mighty important appointment and I am going to take my own good time in making the selection. I am told by the other members of the commission that there is nothing immediately pending in the high-

Eight Grade Crossings Allowed in Polk County

The order allows eight crossings and disallows two of those requested.
