WHAT HAPPENED WHEN WIL-LIAM BROUGHT THE JAP TO MADGE.

"Mis' Gramie!" William's voice, respectful, but filled with excitement, sounded outside the door of the little upstairs sitting room in the Marvin house, where Lillian, my mother-in-law and I were seated in tiled; 12 acres in choice timber: run- consultation as to the best methods of spoiling the plans of the gang of enemy conspirators headed by Grace Draper. "Drat that ape!" my mother-in-law exclaimed, but 'in a low voice that couldn't possibly have reached William's dulled hearing 'He's always around. You can't make two steps nowadays without stumbling over him." This was, of course, exaggera-

bids are requested for the construction tion upon the part of my mothof two-story addition to Fry's ware | er-in-law, who, to do her justice, was uniformly kind in her own crabbed way to William. But she had just been engaged in a long dissertation upon the way she would manage the coming campaign, to which Lillian and I had listened with every appearance of humble admiration and acquiescence, and she didn't relish any interruption.

"Yes, William, what is it?" asked, rising and going to the door where the old fellow stood shuffling his feet and twisting his cap between his hands, sure sign the intense embarrassment which seized him in the presence of strangers.
