FINEST IN MUSICAL ART IS REPRESENTED BY VIOLINIST APPEARING HERE LAST NIGHT

Watching Kathleen Parlow and listening to her music last night at the armory made it easy to believe that anyone could play the violin. That is the highwater mark of art. Critics of every country of the globe have exhausted all the superlatives that the dictionary contains in reviewing her concerts, leaving little that is new or original to be said. From the moment the tall, slender, Auburn-haired figure appeared on the armory stage until her final appearance she had the big audience with her, an audience that forgot time, place and even the musician, so subtle was her art. Bowing and fingering through artistic and well-balanced program Miss Parlow opened new musical vistas to local music lovers. She played compositions by both old and new composers, compositions that are associated especially with the violin. Her magic how they took on individuality, character and revealed new beauties. There were appealing qualities in her playing; technical perfection, rare delicacy of tone and bowing, and whenever called for dramatic forcefulness.

Keeping their money at home, and at the same time allowing betterments to be made, in the line of progress and improved service.
