Adele Garrison's New Phase Of REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

CHAPTER 12 WHAT LILLIAN SAID TO MADGE WHEN THEY TALKED AFTER THEIR SHOPPING TOUR.

I was ungrateful enough to be glad when, upon asking Mrs. Durkee to accompany me to the city upon a shopping expedition. she regretfully told me that a previous engagement would prevent her from accepting my invitation.

I am genuinely fond of my litte neighbor and I yield to no one in admiration of her underniable taste in modish gowning. But she is the fussy shopper type, and a shopping day with her, especially when I have anything of my own to select, generally leaves me fatigued, nervous and with an active dislike for the things I have purchased at her instance. Lillian, on the contrary, is always a delight. She cares for shopping no more than I do, and she has reduced it to a most efficient minimum. She has reduced her possible hat shops to two, her places to buy suits and gowns to the same number, while her shoes always come from the same establishment,

"If the buyers of those places haven't been able to find the best things it's no use for us to hen around the whole city after them," she says, and I've adopted her slogan as mine. I was especially glad of this condition of affairs upon the day when she and I kept our telephone appointment to go shopping, for I knew that because of it we would have ample time for the many things we had to say to each other. Because of my teaching, my interviews with this friend so dear to me are rare. "Well, what's the program?" she asked when we met in Hambel's waiting room, as we had agreed over the telephone.

"Unlimited!" I declared gayly.

"I'm a regular Croesus. Dicky prompt. "I will obey you implicitly, la-I said with ostenatious meekness, and she laughed amusedly as she gave my arm an affectionate squeeze. "You'd better!" she retorted.

and we started on our quest for the "smartest things."

Lillian's Question. We devoted a whole morning to the search, for I found Lillian far more captions than I had ever seen her in selecting things for herself. Finally she professed herself satisfied, and indeed I hardly knew myself in the modish visions the mirros of suit and hat shops gave back to me of my newly acquired habiliments.
"There—that's settled!" Lillian declared with a long-drawn

Where would you like to go?" I inquired. "Some place where there's no music and we can talk," she returned. "I've loads of things to ask you." "Why not Broquin's?" I asked. There's no music there until afternoon, and they have such good things to eat. I don't feel like tearoom food today. Do you?" "Indeed, no. You're a genius. Broquin's it is." And let's walk over. I need the fresh air after this." "So do I," I acquiesced, and after repairing the ravages of our shopping tour we strolled leisurely, enjoyably, to the old restaurant of which I had so many romantic and dramatic memories. No: until we had reached the sweets and coffee stage of a most satisfying luncheon did Lillian begin the questions i knew were on her heart. But the first one surprised me

What do you mean by letting Dicky use Rita Brown's studio for his work?" she asked with a note of sternness. (To be continued)
